starvation, and recent advices intimate that there was danger of a fight breaking out among them. Owen is condemned in unmeasured terms, and his followers deplore having ever had anything to do with him or his scheme.

A similar failure, though not so disastrous, was the result of the socialistic enterprise at Vineland, N. J , some twelve years ago, and like movements having similar endings, started in various parts of the United States within the last two decades, might be cited. The principle to which we have aligned as lacking in them all, is a religious faith strong enough to constltute a controling influence over the whole course of the lives of all who participate in an attempt to establish such a system as that above spoken of. There must be such a thorough subjugation of selfishness as can be effected only by strong religious and moral convictions and sentiments.

As further proof of this, it can be royalty. shown that the only experiments at living upon the communistic plan, that have been attended with any degree of success, have been among communities who have displayed deep religious convictions and fervor, as the Shakers. It may be predicted with reasonable certainty that failure if not disaster and bloodshed, will attend every attempt that may be made by the socialistic theorists of the day, to establish the system of their Utopian | dreams among peoples or communities who are so destitute of religious faith and its restraining influences as are the masses of mankind at the present time.
