

DESERET EVENING NEWS.

Subscription price, $1.00 per week, postage paid at Salt Lake City.

DESERET SEMI-WEEKLY NEWS.

Price, 50¢ per week. Postage, 10¢ extra. We receive 10,000 copies daily, mostly from foreign countries.

THE DESERET WEEKLY.

A $1.00 per week. Average, the cheapest and best news weekly ever seen in a series of current events. Price, per volume of 16 numbers, $1.00, plus 10¢ postage.

THE PLAYMATES.

Who are the playmates, boys? Who's favorite is her? Who loves her? Who's best? Who's the best? And where the playmates now? Oh, what a day, the world is dead. But I have a new playmate, and every body's a boy. Nowhere, in fact, is there a girl.

-2. A. T. T. in Harper's Young People.

ALL FOR SCIENCE.

A few years ago the Magruder lived in Bedford, and Mrs. Magruder, who was an enthusiastic amateur doctor, used to teach a class of female friends the rudiments of physiology. At that time Magruder was in business, and as he generally came home tired by habit of lying on the up-stairs sitting room sofa in the evening for the purpose of taking a nap.

Several times when he did so and Mrs. Magruder had some friends with her down stairs he noticed upon awakening that there was a peculiar movement in his head and a queer sort of vibration throughout the room. When he questioned Mrs. Magruder she said she had never noticed and looked confused and said she must have eaten something which had disagreed with him.

Ultimately the suspicion of Magruder was aroused. He inspected something wrong. A horrible thought crossed his mind that Mrs. Magruder intended to poison him for his kidneys—so she could get some money. When he questioned Mrs. Magruder she said she had never heard of such a possibility.

Magruder revealed his suspicion to his brother, and engaged to secrete himself in a cupboard in the room while he took his usual nap on a certain evening upon the sofa.

When that night arrived Mrs. Magruder pretended to have a "sewing errand" in the parlor, while he remained up stairs to sleep up stairs in the sitting room with that vigilante relative of his on guard.

At last Magruder began to rouse. He turned over, he sat up, he stared wildly at the companion, he looked at his wife; then he snatched upon the sofa and slept in her beside him.

"Bentham, omnibus or other I feel actually full."

Magruder's brother considered that after the performance of the class Magruder ought to feel full enough to eat a comic paper. He snatched from the cupboard, and setting a chair determined to tell the whole story. Mrs. Magruder and the class descended, but he proceeded. Then arose Magruder and discussed the subject with Bentham, while his brother remained in his chair and joined in the conversation with apprehension.

At last the whole party had entered the room Mrs. Magruder closed the door and applied chloroform to her husband's nose.

"As soon as he became completely insensible the searing in the hands of the ladies was quickly laid aside, and to Magruder's secret, further was disclosed the startling fact that this was her class.

Mrs. Magruder began her lecture with some sharp rebukes upon the nervous system, and in order to demonstrate her meaning more plainly she attached a galvanic battery to her husband's toes so that she might make him wriggle before the class. And he did wriggle. Mrs. Magruder gave him a dozen or two shocks and poked him with a ruler to make him jump, while the others stood in a semicircle with notebooks in their hands and watched; "Over very interesting."

Magruder's brother thought it awful, but he was afraid to come out when he reflected that they might want two assistants. Mrs. Magruder then said that she would pursue this branch of the investigation no further at that moment, because Mr. Magruder's system was somewhat debilitated in consequence of an overuse of chloroform of派出, which she had administered in his coffee upon the previous day for the purpose of testing the strength of the coffee.

Mrs. Magruder then proceeded to give the class concerning the general construction of her husband. She said, for instance, that he had well what was called the heart of Mr. Magruder, and she asked the students what was that she said was really won.

"Why the caries, of course," said the class. "It is an argous mass of an irregular pyramidal shape, situated obliquely to the left side of the chest, and it rests on the diaphragm."

One fair young thing said that it did not rest on the diaphragm. Another said she would be sure of a paroxysm if it did, and until the dispute was settled by the professor Magruder's brother's hair stood on end with fear lest they should go to probing hands of Magruder with a switch knife and a lantern for the purpose of determining the actual condition of affairs respecting his diaphragm.

Mrs. Magruder continued. She explained that when she accepted Mr. Magruder he seized her hand, and she required the class to explain what it was that Mr. Magruder actually had held.

The students replied that he held in his grip twenty-seven distinct bones, among which might be found phalanges, the carpus and the metacarpus. The beautiful creature who was incredulous concerning the diaphragm suggested that he also had hold of the diaphragm. But the others scornfully suggested that the diaphragm was a muscle. The discussion became so tameless that blankets were drawn, and there seemed to be a present of 100 hundredfold of time which might be spent in discussing the delusion which was the result when Mr. Magruder kissed her.

Why, surely a confirmation of the evidence is imminent, thus, and the student as she leaned over and kissed Mr. Magruder.

Magruder's brother in the explained thought maybe it wasn't so very evident for Mr. Magruder after all. He considered this portion of the exercise in a certain sense soothing. But all the students said it was perfectly ridiculous, and Mrs. Magruder, after informing the offender that she was not to be disturbed, took up the exercise until the class was dismissed, it could be supplied by herself, ordered her to go to the foot of the class and to learn eighty new lines as a punishment.

"Do you hear me, miss?" demanded Mrs. Magruder when she perceived that that conclusion of the ordealsome exercise did not budge.

"Yes," she said, "I am conscious of a vibration striking against the membranes, compunction, etc., but I am compelled to do the labyrinth until it uplifts the auditory nerve, which conveys the impression to the brain."

"Correct," said the professor. "Then obey me, or I will call my dogs and hawks and scorpions into action and put you in your place by force."

"Yes, and we will help him with our epithets and interjections," exclaimed the rest of the class.

Magruder's tender in the glass of his euphoric oil did not notice that his head and a queer sort of vibration throughout the room. When he questioned Mrs. Magruder she said she had been entirely exhausted and looked confused and said he must have eaten something which had disagreed with him.

Upon the arrival of Bentham the students gathered around him to inquire of his medical treatment. She vacinated Magruder in the left arm, while one of the students bled his right arm and showed her companion how to tie it up to win. They applied leeches to his nose under the professor's instructions that clapped him on the shoulder telling the exercises themselves was manifested by leeches and other engines of war of a peculiarly deadly description. He told that the punishment was too severe for the crime. Magruder himself, as he was convicted, would have regretted that students' operation with courageous epithets and scorpion-like punishment.

Mrs. Magruder had the privilege to give the students in certain operations of medical treatment. She vacinated Magruder in the left arm, while one of the students bled his right arm and showed her companion how to tie it up to win. They applied leeches to his nose under the professor's instructions that clapped him on the shoulder telling the exercises themselves was manifested by leeches and other engines of war of a peculiarly deadly description. He told that the punishment was too severe for the crime. Magruder himself, as he was convicted, would have regretted that students' operation with courageous epithets and scorpion-like punishment.

At last Magruder began to rouse. He turned over, he sat up, he stared wildly at the companion, he looked at his wife; then he snatched upon the sofa and slept in her beside him.

"Bentham, omnibus or other I feel actually full."

Magruder's brother considered that after the performance of the class Magruder ought to feel full enough to eat a comic paper. He snatched from the cupboard, and setting a chair determined to tell the whole story. Mrs. Magruder and the class descended, but he proceeded. Then arose Magruder and discussed the subject with Bentham, while his brother remained in his chair and joined in the conversation with apprehension.

At last the whole party had entered the room Mrs. Magruder closed the door and applied chloroform to her husband's nose.

"As soon as he became completely insensible the searing in the hands of the ladies was quickly laid aside, and to Magruder's secret, further was disclosed the startling fact that this was her class.

Mrs. Magruder began her lecture with some sharp rebukes upon the nervous system, and in order to demonstrate her meaning more plainly she attached a galvanic battery to her husband's toes so that she might make him wriggle before the class. And he did wriggle. Mrs. Magruder gave him a dozen or two shocks and poked him with a ruler to make him jump, while the others stood in a semicircle with notebooks in their hands and watched; "Over very interesting."

Magruder's brother thought it awful, but he was afraid to come out when he reflected that they might want two assistants. Mrs. Magruder then said that she would pursue this branch of the investigation no further at that moment, because Mr. Magruder's system was somewhat debilitated in consequence of an overuse of chloroform of派出, which she had administered in his coffee upon the previous day for the purpose of testing the strength of the coffee.

Mrs. Magruder then proceeded to give the class concerning the general construction of her husband. She said, for instance, that he had well what was called the heart of Mr. Magruder, and she asked the students what was that she said was really won.

"Why the caries, of course," said the class. "It is an argous mass of an irregular pyramidal shape, situated obliquely to the left side of the chest, and it rests on the diaphragm."

One fair young thing said that it did not rest on the diaphragm. Another said she would be sure of a paroxysm if it did, and until the dispute was settled by the professor Magruder's brother's hair stood on end with fear lest they should go to probing hands of Magruder with a switch knife and a lantern for the purpose of determining the actual condition of affairs respecting his diaphragm.

Mrs. Magruder continued. She explained that when she accepted Mr. Magruder he seized her hand, and she required the class to explain what it was that Mr. Magruder actually had held.

The students replied that he held in his grip twenty-seven distinct bones, among which might be found phalanges, the carpus and the metacarpus. The beautiful creature who was incredulous concerning the diaphragm suggested that he also had hold of the diaphragm. But the others scornfully suggested that the diaphragm was a muscle. The discussion became so tameless that blankets were drawn, and there seemed

DESERET EVENING NEWS.

Subscription price, $1.00 per week, postage paid at Salt Lake City.

DESERET SEMI-WEEKLY NEWS.

Price, 50¢ per week. Postage, 10¢ extra. We receive 10,000 copies daily, mostly from foreign countries.

THE DESERET WEEKLY.

A $1.00 per week. Average, the cheapest and best news weekly ever seen in a series of current events. Price, per volume of 16 numbers, $1.00, plus 10¢ postage.

THE PLAYMATES.

Who are the playmates, boys? Who's favorite is her? Who loves her? Who's best? Who's the best? And where the playmates now? Oh, what a day, the world is dead. But I have a new playmate, and every body's a boy. Nowhere, in fact, is there a girl.

-2. A. T. T. in Harper's Young People.

ALL FOR SCIENCE.

A few years ago the Magruder lived in Bedford, and Mrs. Magruder, who was an enthusiastic amateur doctor, used to teach a class of female friends the rudiments of physiology. At that time Magruder was in business, and as he generally came home tired by habit of lying on the up-stairs sitting room sofa in the evening for the purpose of taking a nap.

Several times when he did so and Mrs. Magruder had some friends with her down stairs he noticed upon awakening that there was a peculiar movement in his head and a queer sort of vibration throughout the room. When he questioned Mrs. Magruder she said she had never heard of such a possibility.

Magruder's brother in the explained thought maybe it wasn't so very evident for Mr. Magruder after all. He considered this portion of the exercise in a certain sense soothing. But all the students said it was perfectly ridiculous, and Mrs. Magruder, after informing the offender that she was not to be disturbed, took up the exercise until the class was dismissed, it could be supplied by herself, ordered her to go to the foot of the class and to learn eighty new lines as a punishment.

"Do you hear me, miss?" demanded Mrs. Magruder when she perceived that that conclusion of the ordealsome exercise did not budge.

"Yes," she said, "I am conscious of a vibration striking against the membranes, compunction, etc., but I am compelled to do the labyrinth until it uplifts the auditory nerve, which conveys the impression to the brain."

"Correct," said the professor. "Then obey me, or I will call my dogs and hawks and scorpions and scorpion-like punishment."

"Yes, and we will help him with our epithets and interjections," exclaimed the rest of the class.

Magruder's tender in the glass of his euphoric oil did not notice that his head and a queer sort of vibration throughout the room. When he questioned Mrs. Magruder she said she had never heard of such a possibility.

At last Magruder began to rouse. He turned over, he sat up, he stared wildly at the companion, he looked at his wife; then he snatched upon the sofa and slept in her beside him.

"Bentham, omnibus or other I feel actually full."

Magruder's brother considered that after the performance of the class Magruder ought to feel full enough to eat a comic paper. He snatched from the cupboard, and setting a chair determined to tell the whole story. Mrs. Magruder and the class descended, but he proceeded. Then arose Magruder and discussed the subject with Bentham, while his brother remained in his chair and joined in the conversation with apprehension.

At last the whole party had entered the room Mrs. Magruder closed the door and applied chloroform to her husband's nose.

"As soon as he became completely insensible the searing in the hands of the ladies was quickly laid aside, and to Magruder's secret, further was disclosed the startling fact that this was her class.

Mrs. Magruder began her lecture with some sharp rebukes upon the nervous system, and in order to demonstrate her meaning more plainly she attached a galvanic battery to her husband's toes so that she might make him wriggle before the class. And he did wriggle. Mrs. Magruder gave him a dozen or two shocks and poked him with a ruler to make him jump, while the others stood in a semicircle with notebooks in their hands and watched; "Over very interesting."

Magruder's brother thought it awful, but he was afraid to come out when he reflected that they might want two assistants. Mrs. Magruder then said that she would pursue this branch of the investigation no further at that moment, because Mr. Magruder's system was somewhat debilitated in consequence of an overuse of chloroform of派出, which she had administered in his coffee upon the previous day for the purpose of testing the strength of the coffee.

Mrs. Magruder then proceeded to give the class concerning the general construction of her husband. She said, for instance, that he had well what was called the heart of Mr. Magruder, and she asked the students what was that she said was really won.

"Why the caries, of course," said the class. "It is an argous mass of an irregular pyramidal shape, situated obliquely to the left side of the chest, and it rests on the diaphragm."

One fair young thing said that it did not rest on the diaphragm. Another said she would be sure of a paroxysm if it did, and until the dispute was settled by the professor Magruder's brother's hair stood on end with fear lest they should go to probing hands of Magruder with a switch knife and a lantern for the purpose of determining the actual condition of affairs respecting his diaphragm.

Mrs. Magruder continued. She explained that when she accepted Mr. Magruder he seized her hand, and she required the class to explain what it was that Mr. Magruder actually had held.

The students replied that he held in his grip twenty-seven distinct bones, among which might be found phalanges, the carpus and the metacarpus. The beautiful creature who was incredulous concerning the diaphragm suggested that he also had hold of the diaphragm. But the others scornfully suggested that the diaphragm was a muscle. The discussion became so tameless that blankets were drawn, and there seemed

DESERET EVENING NEWS.

Subscription price, $1.00 per week, postage paid at Salt Lake City.

DESERET SEMI-WEEKLY NEWS.

Price, 50¢ per week. Postage, 10¢ extra. We receive 10,000 copies daily, mostly from foreign countries.

THE DESERET WEEKLY.

A $1.00 per week. Average, the cheapest and best news weekly ever seen in a series of current events. Price, per volume of 16 numbers, $1.00, plus 10¢ postage.

THE PLAYMATES.

Who are the playmates, boys? Who's favorite is her? Who loves her? Who's best? Who's the best? And where the playmates now? Oh, what a day, the world is dead. But I have a new playmate, and every body's a boy. Nowhere, in fact, is there a girl.

-2. A. T. T. in Harper's Young People.

ALL FOR SCIENCE.

A few years ago the Magruder lived in Bedford, and Mrs. Magruder, who was an enthusiastic amateur doctor, used to teach a class of female friends the rudiments of physiology. At that time Magruder was in business, and as he generally came home tired by habit of lying on the up-stairs sitting room sofa in the evening for the purpose of taking a nap.

Several times when he did so and Mrs. Magruder had some friends with her down stairs he noticed upon awakening that there was a peculiar movement in his head and a queer sort of vibration throughout the room. When he questioned Mrs. Magruder she said she had never heard of such a possibility.

Magruder's brother in the explained thought maybe it wasn't so very evident for Mr. Magruder after all. He considered this portion of the exercise in a certain sense soothing. But all the students said it was perfectly ridiculous, and Mrs. Magruder, after informing the offender that she was not to be disturbed, took up the exercise until the class was dismissed, it could be supplied by herself, ordered her to go to the foot of the class and to learn eighty new lines as a punishment.

"Do you hear me, miss?" demanded Mrs. Magruder when she perceived that that conclusion of the ordealsome exercise did not budge.

"Yes," she said, "I am conscious of a vibration striking against the membranes, compunction, etc., but I am compelled to do the labyrinth until it uplifts the auditory nerve, which conveys the impression to the brain."

"Correct," said the professor. "Then obey me, or I will call my dogs and hawks and scorpions and scorpion-like punishment."

"Yes, and we will help him with our epithets and interjections," exclaimed the rest of the class.

Magruder's tender in the glass of his euphoric oil did not notice that his head and a queer sort of vibration throughout the room. When he questioned Mrs. Magruder she said she had never heard of such a possibility.

At last Magruder began to rouse. He turned over, he sat up, he stared wildly at the companion, he looked at his wife; then he snatched upon the sofa and slept in her beside him.

"Bentham, omnibus or other I feel actually full."

Magruder's brother considered that after the performance of the class Magruder ought to feel full enough to eat a comic paper. He snatched from the cupboard, and setting a chair determined to tell the whole story. Mrs. Magruder and the class descended, but he proceeded. Then arose Magruder and discussed the subject with Bentham, while his brother remained in his chair and joined in the conversation with apprehension.

At last the whole party had entered the room Mrs. Magruder closed the door and applied chloroform to her husband's nose.

"As soon as he became completely insensible the searing in the hands of the ladies was quickly laid aside, and to Magruder's secret, further was disclosed the startling fact that this was her class.

Mrs. Magruder began her lecture with some sharp rebukes upon the nervous system, and in order to demonstrate her meaning more plainly she attached a galvanic battery to her husband's toes so that she might make him wriggle before the class. And he did wriggle. Mrs. Magruder gave him a dozen or two shocks and poked him with a ruler to make him jump, while the others stood in a semicircle with notebooks in their hands and watched; "Over very interesting."

Magruder's brother thought it awful, but he was afraid to come out when he reflected that they might want two assistants. Mrs. Magruder then said that she would pursue this branch of the investigation no further at that moment, because Mr. Magruder's system was somewhat debilitated in consequence of an overuse of chloroform of派出, which she had administered in his coffee upon the previous day for the purpose of testing the strength of the coffee.

Mrs. Magruder then proceeded to give the class concerning the general construction of her husband. She said, for instance, that he had well what was called the heart of Mr. Magruder, and she asked the students what was that she said was really won.

"Why the caries, of course," said the class. "It is an argous mass of an irregular pyramidal shape, situated obliquely to the left side of the chest, and it rests on the diaphragm."

One fair young thing said that it did not rest on the diaphragm. Another said she would be sure of a paroxysm if it did, and until the dispute was settled by the professor Magruder's brother's hair stood on end with fear lest they should go to probing hands of Magruder with a switch knife and a lantern for the purpose of determining the actual condition of affairs respecting his diaphragm.

Mrs. Magruder continued. She explained that when she accepted Mr. Magruder he seized her hand, and she required the class to explain what it was that Mr. Magruder actually had held.

The students replied that he held in his grip twenty-seven distinct bones, among which might be found phalanges, the carpus and the metacarpus. The beautiful creature who was incredulous concerning the diaphragm suggested that he also had hold of the diaphragm. But the others scornfully suggested that the diaphragm was a muscle. The discussion became so tameless that blankets were drawn, and there seemed

DESERET EVENING NEWS.

Subscription price, $1.00 per week, postage paid at Salt Lake City.

DESERET SEMI-WEEKLY NEWS.

Price, 50¢ per week. Postage, 10¢ extra. We receive 10,000 copies daily, mostly from foreign countries.

THE DESERET WEEKLY.

A $1.00 per week. Average, the cheapest and best news weekly ever seen in a series of current events. Price, per volume of 16 numbers, $1.00, plus 10¢ postage.

THE PLAYMATES.

Who are the playmates, boys? Who's favorite is her? Who loves her? Who's best? Who's the best? And where the playmates now? Oh, what a day, the world is dead. But I have a new playmate, and every body's a boy. Nowhere, in fact, is there a girl.

-2. A. T. T. in Harper's Young People.

ALL FOR SCIENCE.

A few years ago the Magruder lived in Bedford, and Mrs. Magruder, who was an enthusiastic amateur doctor, used to teach a class of female friends the rudiments of physiology. At that time Magruder was in business, and as he generally came home tired by habit of lying on the up-stairs sitting room sofa in the evening for the purpose of taking a nap.

Several times when he did so and Mrs. Magruder had some friends with her down stairs he noticed upon awakening that there was a peculiar movement in his head and a queer sort of vibration throughout the room. When he questioned Mrs. Magruder she said she had never heard of such a possibility.

Magruder's brother in the explained thought maybe it wasn't so very evident for Mr. Magruder after all. He considered this portion of the exercise in a certain sense soothing. But all the students said it was perfectly ridiculous, and Mrs. Magruder, after informing the offender that she was not to be disturbed, took up the exercise until the class was dismissed, it could be supplied by herself, ordered her to go to the foot of the class and to learn eighty new lines as a punishment.

"Do you hear me, miss?" demanded Mrs. Magruder when she perceived that that conclusion of the ordealsome exercise did not budge.

"Yes," she said, "I am conscious of a vibration striking against the membranes, compunction, etc., but I am compelled to do the labyrinth until it uplifts the auditory nerve, which conveys the impression to the