EVENING NEWS.

Saturday, September 25, 1875.

How to Remove Moles — A Dead Man's Hand.

An extraordinary story of gross superstition and ignorant credulity has been communicated to the Mercury's London correspondent from Lofthouse, a small town in Cleveland, Yorkshire, England. Since she attained womanhood, three years since, Miss Sallie Booth has been reckoned the belle of the small town, and has been much courted and flattered by young men of her rank in life. She was the daughter of a poor farmer, and had received a very primitive education. She had gipsy-looking black eyes, aquiline nose, brilliant white teeth, and small hands; but there were two moles on her upper lip, from which coarse black hairs constantly sprung. Many of her admirers affected to see no end of beauty in these moles, but spiteful girls spoke of Sallie Booth's mustache, and the irritated beauty tried all sorts of quack depilatories to eradicate what she thought facial blemishes. Meanwhile Miss Booth captured an aristocratic lover. He was a son of Captain Wharton, of Shelton Castle, and had acquired an unenviable reputation at Harrow public school for irregularities of a dissolute type. Farmer Booth held a farm under Captain Wharton, and the licentious young man therefore had easy access to the girl. While the girls of the place grew green with envy when they saw Sallie Booth walking forth with the "gentleman lover," older people predicted that no good would come of it. Captain Wharton unavailingly remonstrated with his son, and then warned Farmer Booth of the unscrupulous character of his son's advances to Sallie. But the farmer was as proud of the connection as his daughter, and openly boasted of his future son-in-law in the alehouses of the place. Before long the intimacy between the pair exceeded proper limits, and Sallie importuned Harry to marry her. The request did not educe the expected enthusiasm; yet he languidly said that he had no objection to marrying her if "those horrid moles" were removed from her lip. In the spring and hey-day of their acquaintance he had pronounced them pretty, now their removal was a sine qua non to matrimony. Five-and-twenty miles from Lofthouse, at a small village named Seamer, there resides an old woman purported to possess supernatural powers—always exercised, however, for beneficent end. To old Nanny Hunter, Miss Booth proceeded, and submitted her case. After retiring for "prayer and meditation" the sibyl informed her that there was but one way to obliterate the moles, and that was by touching them with a dead man's hand at midnight in a dark room—the hand to be held in contact with the lips until it grew warm! It was a crucial operation, yet revolting as it was, Sallie resolved to "go through it" at the first opportunity. It was some weeks before a dead man turned up to be experimented on by Miss Booth. But on the last night of June the body of a seaman was washed ashore opposite the alum works, and the corpse was conveyed to the stable of a neighboring public house, and locked up until the inquest. Sallie at once proceeded to the inn and acquainted the old hostler with the story of her moles and the Seamer wise woman's prescriptions, offering him half a sovereign to aid and abet her in applying the swollen, flabby hands of the unknown corpse to her face when midnight came. "She was as bold as a she lion," said Bob Sugget, the ostler, in telling the story afterwards; "she went into the right into the deep darkness of the stable, and I heard her rustling among the straw as she groped for the dead man's hand, while I stood, feeling queer-like, outside the door. It might have been five or it might have been ten minutes when she guv such a screech as might ha' wakened the dead. Then she yell, yell, yelled, like a locomotive whistle, and I took to my heels and ran." Landlord Coulson and his patrons listened with awe and amazement to the ostler's story, and proceeded to the stable with a lantern. The corpse sat bolt upright, white and jelly-like as a new scalded pig, and Sally Booth held on to his shoulders, giggling and grinning and laughing. The spectators were pierced with horror! But as they stood motionless and silent, and saw the girl embrace the clammy corpse and cry, "Kiss me, Harry darling! the moles are gone," they became satisfied that they saw before them a gigantic misfortune that had merged into madness. When the landlord approached to take her away she dropped down with a piercing shriek, and swooned away. She was carried home by four men on the stable door, and almost as soon as she reached her father's house the pangs of premature labor supervened. The waif was never conscious of existence, and the poor young mother was removed during the latter part of August last to York asylum, hopelessly insane.—Ex.
