SHADOWS OF A CITY

AS SEEN BY A SALT LAKE WOMAN

SPEAKING of dogs, Mark Twain certainly has his own original way of making them talk. "My father was a St. Bernard, my mother was a collie, but I am a Presbyterian," says the heroine of "Dog's Tail," a story which is a kind of gentle way, and never harbored resentments for injuries done her, put them easily out of her mind and for the extra money she taught her children her kindly way, and from her we learned also to be brave and prompt in time of danger, and not to run away, but to face the peril that threatened friend or stranger, and help him the best we could without stopping to think what the cost might be to us. And she taught us, not by words only, but by example, and that is the best way and the surest and the most lasting. Why the brave things she did, the splendid things she was just a soldier, and so modest about it—well, you couldn't help admiring her, and you couldn't help imitating her; not even a King Charles spaniel could remain entirely depreciable in her society.

There is as much difference in people as there is in dogs—that is, there is a difference in the way different people treat dogs.

A lad of possibly 14 years, not more, and let us hope not less, stood outside the entrance of the dog show on Wednesday, puffing away at a full-grown cigar.

"Why don't you go inside, Toughy?" asked a colored pal.

"Don't allow me to, that's why," answered Toughy sullenly.

"Ah, come ahead."

"That's yer rash. Be through with this in a jiffy. Jes came out to smoke; couldn't stand it any longer."

"Well they got in there?"

"This here's a dog show, ain't it?"

"Then they ought ter have dogs in there, but they ain't."

"Ain't they got anythin' that goes in?"

"No," disgustedly. "They think they has, I guess."

"Nothin' that kin beat Tiger. I'll bet."

"Well, yer can jes stake yer hull pile on it, they hasn't. Gad! I wish there could have lived till after this here show."

"Reckon he'd showed 'em some fightin' blood, Toughy."

"Strewed that floor in there with the hull bunch at the drop of the hat."

"Been a sick enough crowd, then, a-stavin' at them vacant stalls?"

"Come ahead, let's go in," said Toughy, as he finally finished his smoke.

So much for Tiger and his blood-thirsty disposition, but—what about "Toughy"? Large vices, large virtues, someone tells us. Toughy certainly had the appearance of possessing all the virtues minus the vices. An older and seamier face never set on younger or more drooping shoulders; every line seemed to tell a story of every known vice. Virtue had certainly had no chance to shoot in that scum and barren soil. Perhaps no one had even planted the tiniest seed to begin with; or, if he or she had, nothing had followed to coax it along. No one had instilled in Toughy, probably that he was fashioned after God's own image, and therefore must grow and bloom like a flower, despite the tares by the wayside.

Toughy disappeared in the crowd, not to look for the love that shines in the eyes of a dumb yet human creature, the dog; not to shake the friendly sympathy; not to put the velvet head, but to seek out the blood-thirsty and vicious.

The Great Dances were being led to the basement for inspection, to be passed upon for prizes. Their bay was fierce and threatening, but no doubt worse than their bite. A little thoroughbred lady with slender nose and great brown eyes, and dressed in velvet of snowy white with brown spots, gave evidence of a gentle heart flutter at the approach of these monsters, the Dances. She stood up on her slim little hind legs, with her front paws wrapped closely about the knee of her young master, her eyes pleading what her tongue withheld. It was the act of a frightened child clinging to its mother's skirt and begging in terror to be taken up. Unlike "Toughy," this young master owned his dog for love of her, and not for the fight in her; her mute pleading lasted but a second, for she was quickly gathered into a pair of strong arms, while her little nose sought shelter beneath the lapel of a protecting coat.

Wednesday, a little chap of about three, was jumping before very dog in the show, with love in his eyes and heart for all.

"Pretty doggie" was his greeting to each one, and when his father could permit, his soft little hands fell gently on soft heads, and for every friendly lick he received, he clapped his hands in delight.

"He licked me, papa, ain't he nice doggie?"

"To one dog he was especially attracted, and it happened to be one whose past record boasted of many death victims. Luckily the little fellow could not understand what the men were saying about this hero, or his little heart would have been grieved. "Sweet doggie" he said to them as he looked up into their faces, one and all; "sweet doggie."

"Yes, sweet doggie, very sweet!" answered one, and they all laughed. No wonder "a little child shall lead them." These men were only attracted because of the dog's fighting record, the vicious, whereas the child saw something higher, love and gentleness. The men were looking for that which when roused would have caused them to flee in terror; the child, for that which God surely gave us dogs for, friendship and protection.

For the sake of children, if nothing else, how can grown-ups be cruel to animals?

A little girl stood in her back yard, peering through a fence, her face white and set. A huge dog-fight was on in the opposite yard.

"Oh, mercy!" she kept saying in her childish way, as with horror it dawned upon her that men and boys were actually urging these dogs to fight, and to the death. Finally when the red began to flow, the little mite crawled through an opening in the fence and protested.

"Don't let 'em hurt one another," she wailed, "oh, please don't let 'em!"

But none heeded her. A child was secondary to a dog fight. The men and boys were worked up to a perfect frenzy, and not with the fearless child walked into that death-ring did any give notice. Snatched from the savage jaws, she was placed into the arms of a frantic mother, who had followed her shrieks and cries, but not before it was too late for her pure vision to be blurred by the death struggle of one of the dogs. A bulldog, whose nature it is to be gentle, always, and who does not seek fight, except when roused by men and boys.

"Oh, mamma," sobbed the little girl, "those wicked men made the poor doggies hurt each other—made one kill the other—oh, mamma!"

"Where have you been with your dog, Eddy?" asked one boy of another in our town.

"Down to the Vet's."

"The Vet's?" said the friend in consternation. "Why? I thought your folks was Christian Scientists."

"They are and so am I."

"Why didn't you take your dog to a healer?"

"Not much; a healer would take all the fight out of him, and I've got to put him up against Jim Bailey's dog on Saturday."

LADY BABBLER.

SUIT AGAINST MRS. EDDY INVOLVES GRANDDAUGHTER.

Mary Baker Glover is vitally interested in the suit brought by her father, George Glover, to secure an accounting of the estate of Mrs. Mary Baker Eddy, founder and head of the Church of Christ. Miss Glover will participate very materially in the income which her father will derive from the trust fund created for him by his mother, in the event of the court deciding in his favor that this fund of $150,000 cannot be withdrawn by the influences which Glover claims are controlling the aged head of the Scientists. She is a very charming and attractive young woman whose future education and plans in life are closely involved in this forthcoming suit and which was instituted by her father as much on her account as any other. The case is very complicated and will be watched with intense interest by the country at large. Should the courts decide that at the time Mrs. Eddy created the fund for her relatives she was mentally irresponsible and under control of designing influences, Miss Mary Baker Glover would come into a still larger share of whatever wealth Mrs. Eddy is in a position to devise.
