PEARY'S ARCTIC JOURNEY.

[New York Sun.]

Lieutenant Peary and his party will sail from this city today for North Greenland. They are likely to reach Whale Sound rather earlier than most of the expeditions to those waters. No obstacles have ever been encountered to prevent a well-equipped vessel from reaching Whale Sound, and with a fair fortune the party will probably arrive at the site of their winter quarters about the 15th to the 20th of July. The Greely party reached Littleton Island, further north, on August 2, only twenty-six days from St. Johns. Baffin, who was the first explorer in this region, arrived at Smith Sound earlier in the season than any of his successors except the rescuers of the Greely expedition.

As an American is about to introduce a new idea in North Greenland exploration, it was perhaps particularly appropriate that Whale Sound, was to be his base of operations. It was discovered by Baffin on July 4, during his memorable voyage of 1816. Passing through this sound, whose name was suggested to Baffin by the many whales he saw there, Lieutenant Peary will probably erect the house in which he will spend the coming winter at the deep indentation on the northern shore, near the entrance to Inglesfield Gulf. This shore, as shown on Hayes' chart, is bordered by mountains, and if Peary is able to realize his hope, he will climb one of these giant hills, carrying his ladders and loads on the backs of his party, and step from near its top to the surface of the great ice plateau which is to be his highway to the far north. It was in this way that he reached the inner ice in South Greenland, thus avoiding the chasms and ragged ice that have used up several explorers and destroyed their sledges before the attained the ice plain.

Almost within sight of Whale Sound are the waters where the "Proteus" was crushed in the pack, and where Kane and Hayes battled lurch by lurch with the ice to gain some vantage ground for an advance to new discoveries. Peary will at least be spared this dangerous and trying phase of Arctic effort. The level ice plain, not the treacherous ice-packed sea, is to be his highway. It matters not how deep the snow, for he is an experienced snow traveler, and snowshoes are of the first importance in his enterprise. "I regard this deep, soft snow, which stopped Nordenskjöld," he writes, "not as a bete noir, but as the perfection of roads."

In the little cabin which will shelter his party next winter, about 120 days of darkness or twilight will be spent. Their friends at home may think of them then with considerable confidence as passing the long winter night under fairly comfortable conditions. Everything which past Arctic experience suggests as contributing to comfort and safety, has
