The hand and fore arm were smashed to a pulp, and the cords, as far up as the elbow were ceived in Dillon, Montana, that James Jaggers, a ranchman of Horse Prairie, had shot and killed John B. Bushill, a saloonkeeper of Bannack, in the doorway of the Bannack Hotel. It appears that on the afternoon of the shooting. just before 2 o'clock, Bushill was in the bar-room of the Bannack Hotel and telling how he had made men "weaken" in that town, and turning to Jim Jaggers, Bushill said, "I can make you weaken, too," or words to that effect. Jaggers advised Bushill to take a drink and keep still. Bushill then left the hotel and proceeded across the street to his saloon where he "heeled" himself.
