BRITAIN RUSHING INTO THE FIGHT.

5,000 Troops Notified in Remarkably Short Time.

WARRIORS WILL NOT BEGIN WAR

London, Oct. 8.—Whether may be the cause of Great Britain's intervention in the Transvaal, it is the intention of the government to send a force as large as possible to the aid of the Transvaal. The intention of the government is to send a force as large as possible to the aid of the Transvaal. BRITISH TROOPS LANDING AT DURBAN

THE NATAL BORDER, WHERE HOSTILITIES WILL PROBABLY BEGIN.

New that hostilities may be inevitable in South Africa, all eyes are turned to the Natal border, where it is believed a battle will first occur. The Boers are expected to move from the Transvaal, where they are now gathered, and the Orange Free State troops are expected to move from the Orange Free State, where they are now gathered.

The mobilization of the Transvaal forces, the Orange Free State troops, and the British troops in Natal, is a sign that hostilities are inevitable. The mobilization of the Transvaal forces, the Orange Free State troops, and the British troops in Natal, is a sign that hostilities are inevitable.
