The American Journal of Neurology warns the public against the extravagant claims made for elec. trical remedial appliances. Dr. Cleveland, in the Chicago Medical Journal, says there is very little of a-practical nature in electrical treatment of disease, and medical electricity does not yet deserve enough confidence in its curative properties to warrant anyone becoming a specialist in that field. An ordinary pocket battery in the hands of a skilled physician is more valuable as a curative agent than the costly kind of apparatus so much advertised.
