The goat was formerly bred to a much greater extent in Sweden than is now the case. It has been forced to yield to the rational forest management, and to the more thorough system of agriculture now practiced, and has been exiled to the rocky and woody provinces of northern Sweden. In Lapland it may be considered as making the stage between the nomad and the farmer; when a Laplander has grown poor by the loss of his reindeer, he will take to fishing, and procure some goats. This is the first step of his changing from a fishing Laplander to a settler or a farmer.

In consequence of the great importance of beet cultivation as regards the development of national agriculture, the beet trade has been greatly favored by the State. While a high import duty is laid on foreign sugar, the home sugar industry has been either free from import or but a small duty has been levied. This excise now amounts to half the raw-sugar duty just mentioned, but is decided by the weight of the beets worked, under the supposition that they yield  $6\frac{1}{4}$  per cent. of sugar, whereas the outcome being in reality about 10 per cent., the manufacture of beet sugar enjoys a protection of about 2 per cent. per lb. Dating from the autumn of 1895, the excise will be based upon a supposed outcome of 9 per cent.
