

In the year 1801, a seaman named William Morgan enlisted on board a United States frigate for a three years' cruise in the Mediterranean. He was an awful-looking person, six feet four inches high, with a long, pale, wrinkled visage, sunken eyes, thick black hair standing on end, with white prominent and irregular teeth. It was impossible to define the color of his eyes; his voice was sepulchral, on his right arm was engraved certain mysterious devices, and his tobacco box was of iron. He entered on Friday, the frigate was launched on Friday, the master carpenter who built her was born and died on Friday, and the squadron went out to sea on Friday. These coincidences, added to his singular appearance, caused the sailors to look upon Morgan with some degree of wonder, mingled with suspicion. During the voyage to Gibraltar, his conduct increased this feeling. He went without food two days together; at least he was never seen to eat, and if he slept it was without shutting his eyes or lying down. His shipmates, one day, declared that while at what time of night they would, Morgan was seen setting bolt upright in his hammock, with his eyes glaring and wide open. When on watch upon deck, he would stand still for an hour at a time, gazing on the stars or the ocean, and when roused fall flat on the deck in a swoon. When he revived he preached and talked incoherent rhapsody. He often hinted that he had as many lives as a cat, and more than once offered to let himself be hanged for the gratification of his manes. He had also frequent trances, during which he lay stiff and rigid, with all the appearance of death. These things at length reached the ears of Captain R., who looked upon them as mere tricks and the next time Morgan got into a trance confined him for twenty-four hours, stopping his grog, and devising sundry other punishments. One day when about half way across the Atlantic, and the frigate several leagues ahead of the squadron, there was an alarm of the magazine being on fire, Morgan was on deck with a spoon in his hand, and for some purpose or other, when hearing the cry he made one spring overboard. The fire was soon extinguished, but in the confusion no effort was made to save Morgan. As a matter of course he was drowned. Two days after, one of the ships of the squadron came up, and sent a boat alongside with Billy on board. Twelve hours after his leap, he had been found swimming gallantly with the spoon in his hand, which he said he held fast that he might help himself to salt water when he was dry.

After this the sailors felt convinced that Morgan was a dead man come to life again, and it would be difficult to kill him in any ordinary way. He continued his pranks, stargazing, and swoons, for which he was always severely punished. At last as they approached Gibraltar, he solemnly announced to his shipmates that he intended to drown himself again with the first opportunity. He made his will, dressed himself in his best, and settled all his affairs. He also replenished his tobacco box, put his allowance of biscuit in his pocket, and filled a small canteen with water, which he slung around his neck, saying, that perhaps he might take it into his head to live two or three days in the sea before he finally betook himself to Davy Jones's locker. That same night between twelve and one, Morgan was distinctly seen to come up the hatchway, climb the bulwark and drop into the ocean. A midshipman and two sailors testified to the facts, and Morgan, being missing the next morning, no doubt existed of his suicide.

The talk and wonder were beginning to subside, when, one night, about a week after, the figure of Morgan in wet clothes, with sunken eyes and cadaverous visage, was seen by one of his mates, who happened to be lying awake, to emerge slowly from the forepart of the ship, approach one of the tables where there was a can of water, take a hearty draught, and disappear in the direction whence it came. The sailor told this the next morning, but, as yet, very few believed him. The next night, precisely the same thing occurred, and was seen by a different person. The story came to the ears of Captain R., who, under the conviction that Morgan's drowning himself had been a deceptive, ordered the strictest search to be made throughout the frigate, but without any discovery. The ghost continued to appear, evading capture or surprise. Once, it emptied a tobacco-box, and at another time made free with the fragments of supper which had not been cleared away. In the Bay of Algiers, it spoke, offered its hand to a meesmate, and saying "Good by, Tom," and vanished as usual.

By this time the whole crew were terror-stricken, afraid of their own shadows, and even the officers began to share in the infection. The sailors were permitted to take an occasional turn on shore. To the Tom Brown named above, Morgan had left his watch and chain of clothes. Strutting down a dark lane in the suburbs of Algiers, he heard a well known voice cry out, "Tom, Tom, d-n your eyes! Don't you know your old meesmate?" Tom recognized the tones, and turning round, saw himself confronted by Billy Morgan's ghost. Having no wish to renew the acquaintance, he took to his heels without looking to see if the ghost gave chase, ran to the boat, and told the story as soon as he could find breath. In his berth that very night, the ghost visited him again, and this time he told over Tom's face, who bawled lustily, but the apparition absconded before help arrived, muttering in a hollow whisper, "You shall see me at Malta."

After some weeks, the frigate came to the last named place. As nothing had been seen of the ghost in the interval, it was concluded that the shade was either tired or appeased, and little more was thought of its visitations. Soon after the ship's arrival, a party of sailors, including the heir of Billy Morgan, were frolicking ashore at a small tavern in Valetto. Between three and four in the morning, when the coast was quite as clear-headed as he might have been. He could not tell how long he had been asleep, when he was aroused by a voice whispering in his ear, "Tom, Tom, yake up."
