During a recess to allow committees fo prepare their report, Chairman Elton addressed the mass meeting. He de-clared that laboring men had for a long time worked 365 days a year for their bread, and one day a year had gone to the polls to wage their battle. So far this had only resulted in their playing into the hands of professional politi-cians who had done them no good, and fulfilled none of the promises made befulfilled none of the promises made be-fore the voting season. What he want-ed to see now was a solid labor front at the polls, demanding recognition, and rights which trusts and capitalistic forces had been able to keep from them. We saw what the politicians think of the laboring man two years ago, he said, when we went before the state legislature and asked for a boiler inspector bill. We realized the danger there was to life and property and we asked that a practical bollermaker he appointed boller inspector. They told us they couldn't give it to us because it cost too much money.
