In the future all revenues and taxes must be paid in gold or equivalent currencies.

The body of an unknown man was found floating in the harbor at Oakland, Cal., Thursday morning. It was very emaciated, and was evidently that of a laboring man. On the body was found a bottle of whiskey, and it suggests a clue as to how the man came to be drowned. The forensic estimation of a man perhaps 35 years of age and about six feet tall. He wore a sand jacket than the average, and it is dark brown, with a few streaks of gray.

Corbett's investigation on Friday evening from Superintendent Curran of the Bristol Police at Murlin, notifying him of a state of lawlessness at that place. The message stated that the company's home had been blown up on the night of the 22nd and that Friday evening, while the men were at supper, two rifle shots had been fired through the boarding house, narrowly missing one of the employees. Curran said that it was useless to apply to the sheriff to Louis Menzies was shot and instantly killed by Joe Leroy on the road between Redox and Selby, Cal., about midnight Friday night. The two men had been observing each other since there were no one-winnings to the chair, though a belated citizen claims to have heard the shot. The murdered man was sober and inoffensive. He was a widow and three young children in destitute circumstances. Menzies was employed by the United Oil company at Redox. The quarrel which led to the shooting was the result of an effort to collect $4 from Leroy which had been loaned him by the wife of the murdered man. The murder victim gave no kick and his wife and her mother-in-law later, but he was thought him dangerous.

ness, Hattie Keeler shut and mortally wounded her husband at their apartment. The woman then fled, uttering a screaming shriek. Keeler came home at a drunken condition, bringing a bottle of cyanide, and, calling for his wife, opened the door with a flourish. He came out with a thump of his shoe. His wife said: "I am not here." He then said: "Well, he was to turn out to go to park up on the terrace, so the place belonged to him. He started to strike her. She told him to get out. He said: 'I am not going to go to the hotel for the night. She went into another room, and, through the door, she saw him. He followed her, holding a bottle of cyanide. Overcoming her on the stairs, he raised the bottle over her head, and she quickly produced a revolver from the folds of her dress and leveling it at his head, she said: 'Get out.' He then fled and two of three of the last shots were fired so he was falling or lay on the ground. The woman then fled, uttering a screaming shriek. They struck her husband in the head, and

A band of train robbers twelve in number, including the engineer, boarded a freight train bound for Russell Junction, Cal., and taking the signals out of their running position, they held the train until there are grave doubts as to whether it will recover. As the train was about to pull out a crowd of train robbers, armed with revolvers, rushed for it. Many of the robbers succeeded in getting aboard, but they were seized by the train men and the law. The robbers were taken to prison, but not released in getting them off. The signal was then given to go ahead, and as the train pulled out the robbers without warning began to shoot it. Thomas Curran, the bookkeeper, saw the men and called on them to get off. The train men fired at the robbers, but narrowly missed them, and a violent group with rifles in their hands ran a few feet distant. Hearing the shot, the engineer and the train men ran to a revolver which he held in his hands and fired in their direction. The robbers were scattered in all directions and heavily and Curran could not tell whether he had hit one of the groups or not, but he more slowly ascertained that a tramp driving by across his Clark Abbot and been hit in the back, and that he was seriously injured.

Kills on Purim.
The custom of sending gifts on Purim to friends is honored today even in the house that in the 17th century and to one Purim night he received. Those who would not give such would merit a trifling something of their own household's prosperity, and thus a charitable disposal of one would, under order of this custom, send a gift of money to a friend who would then turn to be a beneficiary under other circumstances. The custom builds the bond of the Jew in benevolence.—American Hebrew.
