THE SHIP ATALANTA.

Here is an item about the lost ship Atalanta, which left Bermuda, homeward bound, on the 31st of January, 1880, and never reached port. She had on board 300 young sailors and officers. Before sailing on her last voyage she had been tested and was found overweighted in her spars, so that she rolled in a dangerous manner. One of the sailors left at Bermuda stated that her captain was always afraid to leave the deck for fear the vessel would tip over. Her masts were large enough for a vessel twice the size.

For several years I looked at the newspaper shipping lists, and was impressed with a particular wreck that was reported in nearly all the papers. When first sighted she was keel upwards, the bright copper bottom being visible. Each time when seen she was in the same locality. Finally this vessel righted, showing her mainmast ten feet above water, and covered with barnacles. She gradually sank lower, the mast going to six feet, then to four feet, then to three feet, and when last seen was nearly under water. She was reported as an unknown vessel. On November 18, 1891, the tug George reported at Philadelphia as having passed, on October 26, in latitude 33 deg. 48 min. north, and longitude 18 west—about a day's steaming from New York—a sunken square rigged vessel, with only a spar above the water. The yardarms with sails attached were still under the water, in 22 fathoms. I am satisfied this vessel is the lost training ship Atalanta. Just before the tug mentioned had passed, a sailing ship crossed right over the wreck, and the captain reported it the same as described.

Respectfully,
