THE INDIAN PROBLEM.

The solution of the Indian question has been thus far one of extreme difficulty, but we believe the Mormons have come nearer to it than any other people. As the writer was for many years intimately connected with it in Utah, where the settlers, from the first, were obliged to face the problem and solve it as best they could, a brief sketch of the Mormon method, which has proved so successful, may be of interest to the readers of the Star.

The Mormon settlers of Utah in 1847 faced difficulties of unusual magnitude, surrounded on every side by Indian tribes for a thousand miles and utterly without help in time of danger, they quickly developed that faculty for self government and self support for which they are so noted.

At that time Utah belonged to Mexico, but the settlers immediately raised the United States flag upon Ensign Peak near the city of Salt Lake, and proclaimed the Territory of Deseret—as they styled it—an integral part of the United States. They organized a provisional government, adopted a republican constitution like that of other States, and sent a deputation with it to Washington praying for admission into the great family of States.

This was not immediately granted, and for three years Deseret was under a provisional government; but in 1850 Congress granted her a Territorial organization under the name of Utah.

From the beginning, the settlers organized as infantry, cavalry and artillery; and during 1849 waged a bloody war with the Timpany Utes which resulted in their complete humiliation. Bloody wars ensued in 1853 with the Utah tribe, and again in 1864, in which over 600 settlers were
