

USES THE MAILS TO HOUND NEW YORKER.

"It is amazing the number of spiteful people who use the United States mail to annoy others, and even more amazing the devices they invent to make their victims miserable," said a postoffice inspector to a party of friends at dinner the other evening.

"The most persistent I ever heard of came to the notice of the department here in New York a few years ago. At that time Curry Haverly Bartlett had an office in a big building downtown. He was a promoter of some sort, and had come from Chicago a year before. He didn't like his name, so he used only the initials, C. H.

"One night, according to the story he told me later, he was one of a party when the subject of unfortunate names came up. In a burst of confidence, superinduced by more than enough wine, Bartlett spoke of his own name and how detestable it had been to him from boyhood.

"The next morning the mail included a letter addressed to Curry Haverly Bartlett. Opening it, Bartlett found a slip of paper, on which was written, 'Oh, what a name!'

"He recalled his declaration of the night before and dismissed the matter as the joke of one of the party.

"Next morning his mail contained another letter in the same sort of envelope addressed 'Curry H. Bartlett.' Inside was a slip of paper identical with the one received the day before and bearing the same legend, 'Oh, what a name!'

"The next morning's letter was addressed to 'C. Haverly Bartlett,' and inside was the same sentence.

"Well, Bartlett got a letter every morning, and in every letter the same 'Oh, what a name!'

"The writer made a new play on the name each day for weeks. The letters came addressed to Court House Bartlett, Coal Hod Bartlett, Cart Horse Bartlett, City Hall Bartlett, etc.

"When the writer ran out of new names he repeated the old ones. Bartlett finally reported to the postoffice department, and two inspectors were put on the case. We traced the letters to a big office building not far from the one in which Bartlett had his office. The building has a mail chute, so that we were puzzled to discover from what floor they were mailed.

"Finally we hit upon a scheme to discover the writer of the letters. I went to the manager of the building, explained the situation and got permission to put the mailing tube out of commission, so that all tenants had to carry their mail out to the street boxes. In two days we had the Bartlett letters located in a certain box on Broadway, and within a week caught a man in the act of mailing one of them.

"It had wondered what we could do about it even after we had caught him, but I was willing to take a chance of at least threatening him with arrest. Luckily that was not necessary.

"The writer proved to be a one-time friend of Bartlett. He said he had become offended at Bartlett's behavior on the night that Bartlett had confessed hatred for 'Curry Haverly' as a name, and that in a spirit of spite he had mailed the first letter. After mailing it the affair seemed like a good joke, and he decided to keep it up for a few days. Then somehow he didn't seem able to stop.

"He declared he was glad he had been caught. I arranged to go with him and talk it over with Bartlett. He confessed to his victim, made such amends as were possible and the incident was declared closed."—New York Sun.

Ostriches and Angels.

Ralph Adams Cram, the author-architect, was talking about a wealthy amateur painter.

"A lady," he said, "paused before his latest picture at one of his studio tests, and cried enthusiastically:

"Oh, perfect! Mr. Smeat, these ostriches are simply superb. You should never paint anything but birds."

"Smeat" winced.

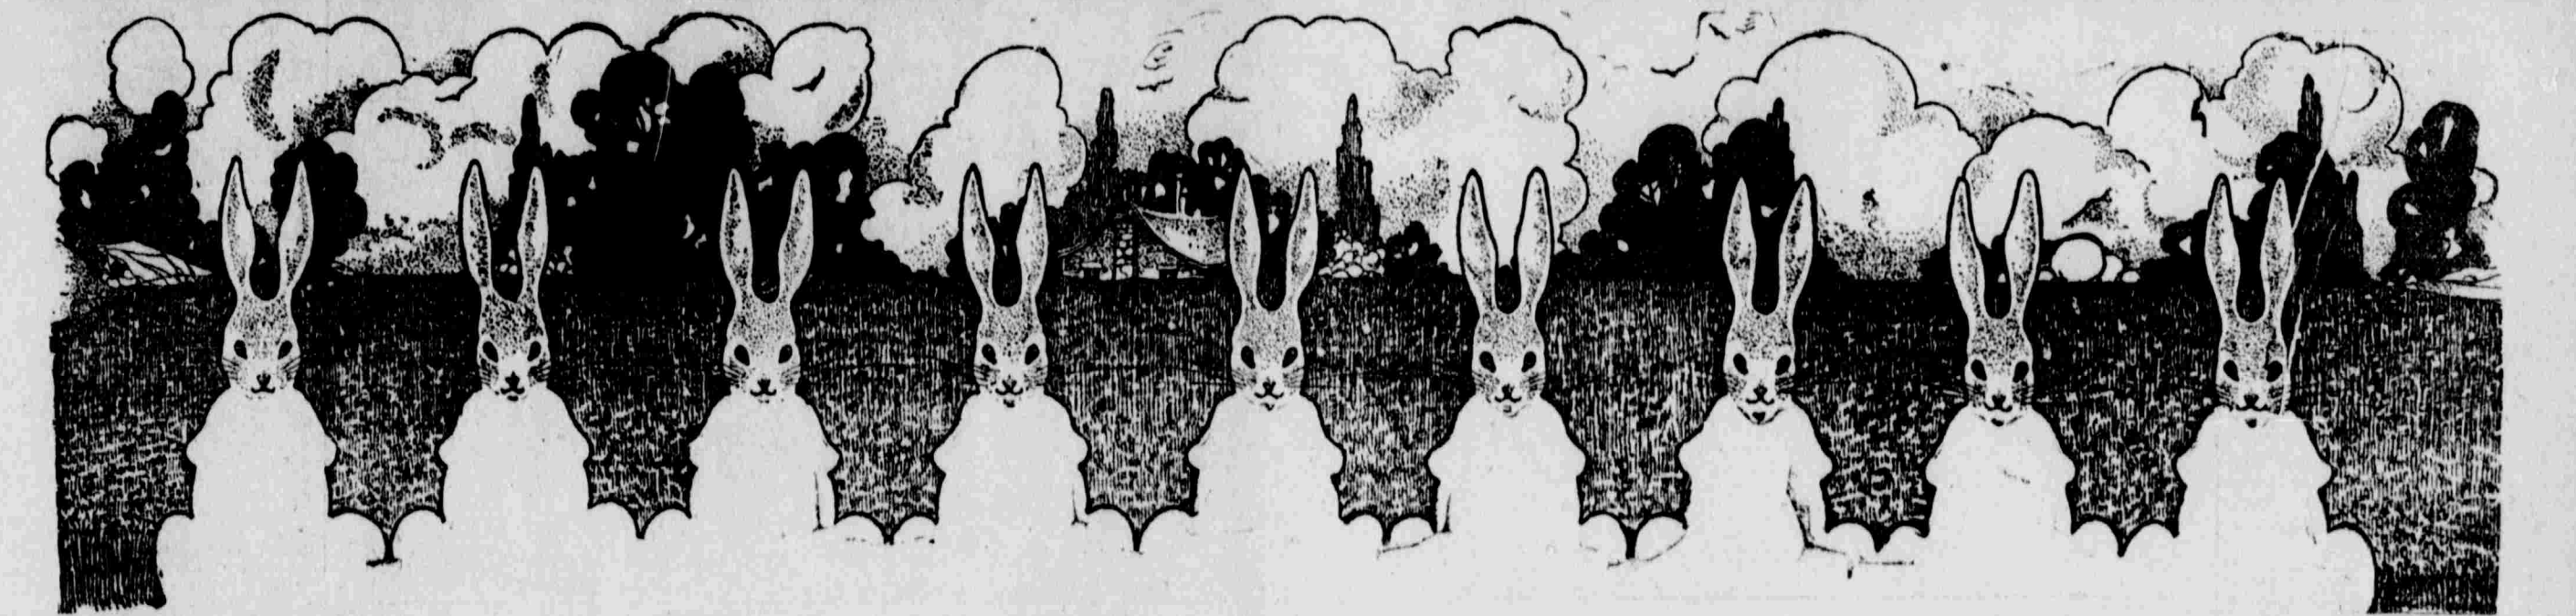

"Those are not ostriches, madam. They are angels," he said hurriedly.
