Let me make one fact perfectly clear at the beginning, and that is, 'Dewi Sant' is no myth. I am not sure whether this much could be said of the patron saints of some other countries. I do not wish to wound the susceptibilities of anyone present here tonight, but I will say this, that the question of the existence of some of them appears to me to be, at least, problematical. St. Patrick also was told to abandon Wales to a greater man than abandon Wales to a greater man than he, who was yet to come, and was sent over to labor in Ireland. I presume that there are some Irishmen listening to me tonight; if so, they can take it from me that their patron saint was at first a Welsh monk, and that they are in-debted to Wales for the introduction of Christianity into their beloved island home. Other instances of this character could be given, but I think these will suffice. 'Dewi Sant' received his cluca-tion at Henlian (Vitus Rebus), Hangor Ulivid and he also spent 10 years study-Ilityd, and he also spent 10 years study-ing the Scripture at a place called Ty Ing the scripture at a place called Ty Gwyn ar Do, under a man named Pau-linus, where he had for a fellow student St. Teilo, second bishop of Liandaff. After completing its training, he wan-dered about the country for many years preaching, one of the places visited by ilm was Glastonbury, noted for its amous abbey, and it is said that it was bewi who built the first church there. Dewi who built the first church there. When he returned to his own country he settled down with his disciples at a place called Rosita. When Dewi and his followers arrived there, we are told that they lit a fire, and that the smoke from it covered the whole country for miles around, which was a sign to them that the land was to be theirs. The king of that district, named Boya, was so incensed at this that he set out to destroy 'Dewi' and his followers, but when he arrived at their encampment he and his men were selzed by an ill-ness which made them powerless to harm 'Dewi.' When Boya returned to his home he found all his animals dead; he understood the portent and returned and made peace with Dewi and gave and made peace with Dewi and gave him the land. On his arrival home the second time he found that all his ani-mals had been restored to life. His re-moval to St. David's came about in this way, the bishopric of St. David's was vacant, and the princes, noblemen, and people gathered together to select a new bishop, stipulated that the new bishop must be able to preach so that everyone in that vast crowd, which numbered tens of thousands, would be
