A LETTER TO PAPA.

I'm going to write a letter to papa
I know he'd like to hear
What the little girl is doing
Who lives next door where he's gone.
He told him how I missed him,
And how I wished he'd come,
And never, never leave us,
But always stay at home.

I'll tell him how my dolly,
Is very sleepy on the floor;
I fear that none will wake her,
Oh, please don't leave the door,
For I must not be bothered,
That's what my ma would say
When she laughed a letter,
And sends me off to play.

I'll send him lots of kisses
And one bright, shining curl;
I'll ask him to remember
His lovely little girl.
I want so much to see him,
But I won't cry a word,
Though when I write my letter
The tears would blot my ink.

I'm going to write to papa,
I just do love him SO!
I'll put a kiss inside
That's a secret all by me.
—Ella S. Higbee in Arkansaw Traveler.

SPECTER HAUNTED.

I notice do not believe in visions, and have often laughed at visionaries when I have heard them relate some wonderful spectral tale, in which they placed implicit faith. This was my manner of thinking when I paid a visit to the colonel of my regiment, who installed an old mansion a few miles from the town. Here I changed my opinion and that time! I think not, and I certainly cannot deny that there are some influences which exercise a strange power over the minds of human beings. The following history, natured in its most supernatural details, and the different items all consistent, shall show, may prove my assertion!

The colonel was a cheerful, good humored man, and his wife was a perfect personification of calmness and domestic quietness, the fitting companion of a man who liked to repose in the tranquility of his home after the fatigues of service. The family consisted of two daughters and a French lady who played the part of governess, though the daughters seemed to have passed the age at which young ladies require governing.

The eldest was a merry girl, spirited to excess, always dancing in life, jumping restlessly from one object to another. I have seen her reading, dancing, singing and all within the same quarter of an hour. I have known her to shed tears at the death of some poor mouse in India, and with the tears still in her eyes burst into a merry laugh at a little dog who would begin to bark violently. After all, notwithstanding her eccentricities, Augusta was a girl full of grace and amiability which charmed everybody.

It would be impossible to find a greater contrast than that which existed between the characters of Augusta and Maria, her younger sister. Incline to the latter, imagine a respectable figure and a face of wonderful beauty. Clearly of dissimilar features—inactive, the figure and face moving slowly, solemnly and with measured step through the house, and letting fall from time to time, through half open lips, single phrases in a deep, low voice, and you will understand that any one would at first feel himself shivering with a supernatural feeling, produced by the aspect of such a spectrelike appearance.

When I first became acquainted with and conversed with Maria I soon felt convinced that her singular and fantastic nature was rather external than internal. In the few remarks she made to me she manifested a delicate, womanly feeling, a clear mind and a kind heart. Not the slightest trace of an overstrained imagination was to be found, though her melancholy smiles and her tear laden looks betrayed a morbid state of feeling which exercised an unpleasant influence upon this delicate girl.

One thing appeared strange to me, which was that the family was always embarrassed when any one held conversation with Maria, and that they invariably tried to interrupt the discourse, even by interfering in an abrupt and decided manner. But what appeared still stranger was, that as soon as the clock struck 8 Maria was begged either by her father, mother or sister, to go to bed. These entreaties were accompanied by such kind words and such caressing manners that the speakers appeared to forget that they were addressing a grown up young lady. The French lady regularly accompanied her, and so it happened that both the governess and Maria were always absent at supper, which used to be served at 9 o'clock.

Thus my conversation was limited to the spirited Augusta, who entertained me with her sprightly and variable wit. But as soon as I began to speak of Maria a sadness passed over the entire family, and the mother, to put an end to my inquiries, told me that Maria was in a bad state of health, that every evening about 9 o'clock she was visited with feverish attacks, and that the physician had ordered her perfect repose and tranquility at that hour.

I felt convinced from the manner in which this account was given that it was not correct, and that some mystery was connected with Maria and her regular disappearance in the evening, but it was long after I had left the house that this mystery was solved, as follows:

Maria had been a healthy girl, as merry and as happy as her elder sister Augusta. Her fourteenth birthday had arrived, and a great many of her girlish friends were assembled in order to celebrate it. The party were all congregated in a nice little arbor in the garden, and full of mirth, of joy, they laughed and sang without noticing that the evening was advancing. Indeed, as it grew darker and darker they became more and more noisy, and at last in the dim twilight they began to dance the most strange dances, mingling themselves in circles, etc., etc.

"Now, my friends," said Maria, in a voice of exuberant gayety; "now I will appear to you as the White Lady; of whom the late gardener has told me so many strange tales. But you must come with me to the other end of the garden—there, by the walls of the old tower."

Thus speaking she enveloped herself in a white shawl, and gave the flow, followed by a swarm of merry, laughing girls. Successful Lucy Davis resolved the old dilapidated wall to see she crept cautiously, and becoming motionless as if paralyzed in all her members, exclaimed, in a hollow voice, "Do you see, do you see?"

The sound of the clock striking at that moment the hour of nine increased the horror with which Maria's manner inspired her companions.

"Do you see?—the figure—close to me—stretched her arms after me! You see"—

The girls did not see anything, but overcome by terror they all ran away. One only remained. There is the figure—close behind me!"

The whole family rose as by common consent. All looked at the spot pointed out by Maria, but as they could not perceive anything which could be taken for a figure or apparition, the colonel, stepping forward to his daughter said in a voice of the greatest composure: "My dear girl, to calm yourself—the apparition is nothing but a vision, a chimera, a creation of your own brain. We can see nothing, absolutely nothing; and if there was any figure before you should see and see it as well as you. Try to be calm, my child! recollect yourself!"

"My God!" sighed Maria; "do you then think me mad? There it is, there! It approaches to long white arms toward me! Oh! it makes me sign—it nods to me!"

As if deprived of free will and with her eyes strangely directed before her at the spot where she said the figure was standing, Maria put her hands behind her and took hold of a plate which was on the table. She raised it lightly, and then released it from her hands, and the plate, as if sustained by some invisible power, turned slowly round in the air, and then fell gently to the ground.

The following day the desolation caused by the scene of the preceding evening was to be shortly observed. It appeared as if the phantom had made its way from Maria to Augusta. The former became quite freed from her vision, but from that moment Augusta's mind became affected, and she imagined herself to be the aerial spectre that frightened Maria.

She who had before been so joyful, so merry, fell into even a deeper melancholy than that which had oppressed her sister. Augusta avoided all society, she scarcely dared speak or even breathe before any one, fearing to betray her presence and to spread terror around her. The only person who approached her was her sister Maria, assisted by the governess. The madness of Augusta was not to be overcome by the counsels of the physician, who had opened the vitals to be blistered. His advice even proved calamitous to the whole family, for the fatal events following attached the mother of the girls and deprived her of life.

When, some time after my first visit, I again stood in the parlor where I had once been so hospitably received, I found no one but the French lady. The colonel, rendered desperate by the misfortune which had befallen his family, entered again into active service. Maria was in close attendance on her sister, vainly endeavoring to sweep away that delusion, the influence of which she had herself once labored under. In a little time Augusta died, and from that moment Maria again became a visionary, the phantom appearing at its old hour and assuming the form of Augusta.—New York World.

A Dog's Cool Treatment of Hotels.

A few winters ago I stopped at a certain hotel in Virginia. I had a pointer and young setter with me. The proprietor told me that dogs were not allowed in the house, but gave the assurance that they would be properly cared for elsewhere. Of course this was satisfactory. I promised the servant who led them off a fee if he took extra care of them. Returning from the theater late that night I asked to be shown the place my dogs were in. A drover was raised, but I insisted, and I found them chained in an open court yard, with no protection from the bitter weather, and they were actually lying on the frozen snow shivering as if they would injure their lives. I was mad and used some plain language, and insisted on having the best shed and there.—Our Week's Sport.

Regardless a single homely phrase has in it so much truth that it sums up an entire situation. Mrs T——'s cook is in no mind appearance rather a stupid girl, but she is by no means without a homely wit and a goodly share of common sense.

Not long since Mrs. T—— had occasion to talk with the girl in relation to a grocer, a man of remarkably plausible manners, but concerning the honesty of whose dealings grave doubts had arisen.

"He is certainly not honest in his weights," Mrs. T—— said, "but he is very polite. Times it all least that he would fix his favor."

"Oh, yesim," the girl answered readily; "I always thought he was too sweet to be wholesome."—Youth's Companion.
