A NEW ERA IN FRANCE.

THE present age may well be called the age of reform, that being most decidedly the characteristic of the century. Reforms in religion, in politics, in medicine, and in diet are all making headway and promise in the course of a few years to create wonderful changes in the condition of the masses. Reforms in politics are the most apparent, or rather their results are, from the fact that they immediately affect the con-dition of the people at large, emancipat-ing them from shackles that have bound ing them from shackles that have bound in politics are the most apparent, or them for ages. This political agitation has prevailed to a remarkable extent the last few years in Europe, its latest results being the recent revolution in Spain, the separation of Church and Government reforms in France.

Hitherto it has been the unhappy fate of the last named nation, no matter what the name and style of the Government, whether monarchical or Republican, to be ruled in a most absolute It is a very heavy loss. manner. The whole power of the government has rested in the head of the government, who has held himself responsible neither to ministers nor to people, depending upon the army to sustain his acts. This absolutism has led to many grievous and tyrannical acts, and these again have led to those outbreaks of popular fury which have overturned the government and exiled their rulers, for which the people of also ied to immense military establishments, which, while they have placed France first among the military powers of the world, have also impoverished the French people. the late general election the will of the people as given expression to at the polls, said as plainly as it could be said, that this system of absolutism would not be endured much longer, and that concessions must be granted, or the establishment of a new form of government would be very likely to take place at an early period. Some of the Emperor's advisers counselled him to grant reforms, and in fact, to drop the system of autocratic or antonymic government, and to adopt the representative, more like that of the United States or Great Britain.

Whether the advice of his ministers, or his own insight into the future has prevailed with the Emperor, one thing is clear, and that is that an entire change in the nature of the government is about to be instituted. Napoleon has determined to rule alone no longer, and henceforth the responsibilities of governing the people of France will be shared by the Emperor, his ministers and the representatives of the people. the ministry being responsible to the latter. The national finances are to be controlled by the people's representatives in Miture Lad as in this country and Belinin they will vote the supplies and say how the people's money shall be spent.

This is a new era for France, an era in which she will be likely to gain prosperity, and greater and more lasting glory than that derived from the faise grandeur surrounding military achievements. Napoleon has the credit of being the most astute personage now diling a throne, and he has never given a greater proof of it than in thus yielding to the demands of the people; and his course In this crisis will do more towards the perpetuation of his dynasty. than all the deeds of the family hitherto.

The age of and the rage for martial glory has passed; this is one of reforms and of the advancement of science, people. Napoleon has shown himself equal to the wants of the times, and henceforth the Brench nation has fadlities for development and progress such as it has never before enjoyed. With this change in the nature of the Government it may be reasonably expected that nothing more will be heard of the political excitement and changes of Government that have been so common in France since the dawning of the great revolution of 1759, for honesterth bring about peace and autiv; but these will just satisfaction by the trading in France since the dawning of the
