Salt Lake City and the Mormons.

The situation of Salt Lake City is one of surpassing beauty. It lies on the eastern side of the valley, just leaning itself a little way upon the sloping bench of the Wasatch mountains, whose snowy sides and summits loom grandly in the background of the scene. Across the valley, a dozen miles away, stretches the parallel range of the Oquirrh Mountains, more green and less rugged than the nearer heights. Looking north and south, with the long reach of vision which the eye enjoys in this dry, transparent air, the two borders of mountain seem to nearly meet and frame the magnificent valley-picture in. Standing on one of the overlooking hills, with the beautiful city at your feet, the mountains behind and before, the green, smooth plain between them, the liver Jordan winding through it like a silver thread, from Utah Lake to Great Salt Lake—both lakes within the sweep of landscape which the eye takes in—if this earth affords a fairer, more glorious panorama, to be scanned in a single view, I hope I may be permitted to see it before I die, but I do not expect that surprising delight.

Whether consciously or not, the City of the Saints was laid out to be beautiful. In its earlier days the wide, infrequent streets, enclosing large squares or blocks, must have given a straggling appearance to the town; but now that it is becoming compactly built, with abundant trees to line the streets and shade the house grounds and the gardens, its look to the visitor is most inviting. The little brook-like streams of water which flow, and most times with a gurgling current, down either side of every street, contributing a rivulet for irrigation to every door-yard, add very much to the comfortable, attractive aspect of the city.

Within the last three years, especially, the city has been much improved as well as enlarged. The business structures on its principal streets have assumed more style, gas lighting has been introduced, street railways established, and the town has been vivified and modernized in a rapid way. The Mormons accomplished wonders, in their creation of a city here, and in their whole settlement of this remote wilderness, when the circumstances of their migration to it are considered. * * *

Although considerably in the minority yet the Gentiles feel secure in their strength of numbers, independent, and more aggressive, I think, in their general disposition towards the Mormons than is at all just or reasonable. * * * There is no sufficient excuse for the sort of hectoring insolence which seems to characterize the attitude of a majority of them toward the Mormons—or, rather, toward the Mormon leaders. Universally, I think, the testimony of the Gentiles who are at all just or reasonable, is to the effect that the Mormons at large—the commonality, that is, of Brigham Young's Zion—are a sincere, simple-minded, honest, amiable people. They seem to be hospitable as a rule, kindly disposed toward all men, pious in their way, and not at all aggressively intolerant. It is toward the heads of the church—the hierarchy * * * the presidents, the elders, the apostles, the bishops and the priests—that the bitterness of Gentile animosity is aimed. Against these, all and singular, from "President Young" down, the feeling is very strong. * * * I do not relish the hectoring and insulting way in which the Gentiles of the Territory, or many of them, with * * * their organ, and most of the Federal judges and officials for their backers, keep up a brewing of bad blood between themselves and their Mormon neighbors. I should respect them more if they held the safe ground which they now occupy with more dignity and less aggressiveness.—Buffalo Express, June 28.
