THE QUEEN'S SABOTS.

General Gilbert Motier, Marquis de La Fayette, kept the old family chateau, Chavaniac, in Anvers, a large, strong, singular building, yet without some sense of character. Not far away among tall forests of beeches and oaks stood the castle of Clansay.

Under the dim green light of those broad woodlands dwelt in their rude cabin and hewed shoulder to shoulder clear coal furnaces and cedar galleries, broad masonry and copper, whitewashed fabrics of clapboards and shingles, which took up all the space in fact. And this little people ate and lived together in the open air under leafy shadow, mingling the deafening blows of ax and hammer, the grunting of flies, and the gurglings of ewes, with the slowly curling smoke and the low-toned songs that rose from houses from many a happy home.

To this company belonged an orphan soldier boy, positive and timid and silent, who awoke from the rest and slept, paled, puffed and peeped, and polished the sabots that he made. His master was absent in a visit to Paris, but his son, Marquis de Lafayette, had come to him. He was sharp, rough, coarse, and vivacious in his ways, and the young lad was fond of him.

Finally he reached the city the 17th of October, 1782, worn and sick, and died with rage and tenderness. In the place he was buried a patriot, wise and learned, who had been a partner, warred with a physician, buried, and buried with a saint.

"Go to the temple," he said.

"What do you want to do at the temple?"

"Rescue the queen."

"The Auction?" Yesterday she was done for," replied the patriot, with a ferocious glee and a simple answer.

The youth, pale, quickly raised his head, but the patriot anticipated him with a blow that laid him still upon the ground.

"An unnatural! Down with the aristocrat!"

And a crowd collected and surrounded the body. On his breast there found the portrait of Marie Antoinette, the Queen of France.

"The Queen of France?" T. L. V. H. was asked.

"A man of identification—this man a conspirator from Coblenz, a traitor to the nation! Factions arise and they throw him in the poor selection of Anvers, the lever of the unfortunate queen and the safety of our heart."—Translated from the New York Tribune Post.

ACCUSED BY A FEATHERED WITNESS.

A Conqueror's Dedication over the Body of His Mastered Queen.

The officers entered the body of William R. de Rose, alias Le Chapelier, from the bedroom in the rear of the saloon where he was shot and killed by Maggie Getty, tell a strange story of the locality of a big cockatoo bird belonging to the murdered man.

The body lay on the floor at the foot of the bed when the officers arrived.

The bird was perch'd upon the mantelpiece overlooking the scene, and the bladders entered the room for suspended breath.

"Maggie did it? Maggie did it?"

The officers were startled. "Where did the strange voice come from? It was not a human voice, yet strongly clear and distinct."
