THE SONGS
Out on the water in the autumn night,
Aloft with the stars and the rising tide,
And the steady vessel that anchored rice,
And long like slow s in the misty light.
Out on the water with a lugger face,
White as the surf on the other shore,
Wore and weary—no single trace
Of the mate, having thus become and woe
On the deluge check in the years of yore.

Worn and wan, with a ghostly eye,
And the glance of the doomed, who are stored
In the dark, silent, deep, shadowed barge,
Holding fast farewell to the sea and day.

Behind her, the city in roul and roar,
The cold dark water and death before.

A myriad mournful crowds throng,

A prayer long forgotten, a sweet home song,

The hum of a brook a plighted word,

An odor of roses, the note of a lark,

Foot in and pass through the throbbing brain.

Amidst the dead and gone in the terrible pain.

The anguish of loss and the sense of wrong,

With the elated life that had dragged so long.

With a passionate yearning for quiet and rest.

And a yearning that the still for the best

Is to sought to the gurgling water's breast.

A moment the lights from the city gleam.

As her arms are flung in the thrill of death,

And her hands are clenched in the struggle for breath.

As one who wrote with a stifling dream;

Then all is over, the bournes in past,

The quiet bosom has peace at last.

A CHAPTER OF SORRIES.

A WOMAN'S WHISPER TO HUSBANDS.

I suppose if a man reads the heading of this paragraph he will consider himself perfectly justifiable in skipping the rest, with the remark, "Well, there is something that does not concern me," for that is man fashion, to jump right over anything that may be a little trouble, and leave the poor woman to wade through it alone, and see how deep they go in. Now don't assume such an air of injured innocence, and look so perfectly abashed at this unimodifiable assertion my good lords, for I am not referring to the substantial or to the magnanimous sliding of the first sin on to the delicate shoulders of Eve, whose back you know was better fitted to bear the burden than that of strong, masculine Adam.

But to the point. Babies do concern men as well as women. It should be a half and half share, but still even of the former generally work out the fractional part, one twentieth, and the remainder must be solved by women. Now, as regards babies, we all must stand upon one common platform; we can't get here without being babies, and the admision of this fact should make us more lenient toward the ill and grievous sins of the pink-faced mites of humanity, who, in turn, come to claim our attention. This idea, when stated down, is not so bad either; for if grown up men and women were to be born into the world, who, on this planet, would be found to do the embroidering, stitching, tucking, and ruffing, that invariably heralds the arrival of a dear little helpless baby. No; it is being little and helpless and dependent that gives them such a hold upon our nerves. The change of a baby naturally devolves upon the mother, and this is right, for a woman's work and her duties are at home; and of all despicable things we detect most to see a man sitting in the corner taking care of baby, while the mother is up street talking politics or attending a public meeting. We don't blame a man for not wanting to be hen-pecked, or for practice. But we want to sell this thing over fairly and plainly, and see where they might improve upon the original plan.

"Any sensible woman is perfectly willing to take one of one, two or a half dozen babies all day; sooth, rock, jump, toss and coax, from six in the morning until six at night, but when seven o'clock comes, she drops down his great coat, and punctually departs to fulfill "that engagement" up street, (and to make it worse, she isn't quite sure where "that engagement" is,) then she can stand no more, and of course resort to woman's usual subterfuge, a good cry, which always makes men so mad and does not tend to improve their general appearance in the least. Inasmuch as women eyelids and red noses are not included in the list of the seven beauties of woman, however, "what can't be cured must be endured," so with a thought of "how nice it was when she was a girl," she picks up the wee image of her paternal ancestor, wiping the dirty little face gently, and the child a good night, so to ease her own excited feelings; then when it does sob itself to sleep, she kisses it awake, for fear "something might be the matter," and she had been cross when it went to sleep.

When all is quiet again, she patches and darns and thinks until late bedtime, and then gently, (with a fore-thought ever of consequences) creeps into her couch, intending to sleep with one eye open until to determine which is the weaker, and the aching head and tired limbs, for while visions of greasy dish-water and belated spouses mingle confusedly in her brain, baby discovers that it is night and time for him to begin his nocturnal march. The mother is a fair representative of small-boat specimen, and bites her with his little heated guns; he beats her with his diminutive clenched fists and screams an octave too high for melody, in the midst of the uproar he comes, and cert'ly now he will help. Will he? Well, wait and see—no indeed! He's too tired to never could sleep. If makes him sick at the stomach, he thinks that "that child is going to be a real pest." And rates him as such a bad bed, but in answer to an imploring look, consents to stay, and hastily disrobing, is soon snoring away regardless of the racket.
