November in Chili. BY P. P. PRATT.

Ts the spring of the year, all the foun tains are full-All nature is pregnant with life and with love; A chorus of voices ascend from each pool-A myriad of songsters enliven the grove.

To her nest, 'mid the Andes, the Condor retires-The winds from Magellan no longer prevail; Sol. with the north breeze returning, inspires lesv life on the zephyr, and love on the gale.

Theforest is clad in its robes of fresh green, Where the dove sings an anthem, his mate to decoy; Theorehard is dressed as a holyday green, and the rosebud is bursting with fullness of joy.

Theorange, the olive, the fig and the vine, Are clothed as in Eden, with innocent bloom; The earth as-an altar of incense divine, Exhales a sweet odor of richest perfume.

Theyoung of the flock bound exulting away, While their dams nip the blade, 'mid the dew-drops of morn:

And groups of young Ninos are sportive and gay, Yet my heart "mid this gladness is sad and forlorn.

I sigh for the storms of November to come, The frost, and the snow drifted plain 1 would see; The bleak, wintry blasts of my own mountain home, tom. And the storm-beaten glacier are dearer to me.

The chime of the sleigh bell again I would hear-The low mourning tempest in harmony roll; It would speak of my country, and kindred so dear, Oh! this would be music indeed to my soul.
