THE ESCAPE.

A trim bright little figure was that of Margaret Dixon, standing in the doorway of the low log-house, peering high upon the bluff overhanging the Mississippi.

A way beyond, stretching as far as the horizon, lay rolling wastes of snowy prairie, interspersed by here and there by groves set like islands in the pathless space of those inland oceans.

Directly beneath wound the river, crisscrossed over with glittering scales of ice, and resembling like some huge and toiled serpent, whose stiffened coils gleamed dully through the leaf-bereft branches.

Towering high as were the bladders on the bottom lands, they looked men-shrubs to the eyes of Margaret Dixon, so sheer and deep was the descent from her bird's nest of a home down to the water's level.

She shaded her face with one hand, and looked beyond the dizzy declivity, toward where a thin, blue smoke floated up out of the shadowy depths, and the stroke of a woodman's axe rang sharply vibrant upon the frosty air.

A smile, loving and wisely, dimpled about her ripe, red lips, and lit up her brown eyes, for she knew that the fire had been kindled by her husband, and that the echoing axe-stroke was swung by as honest a hand as ever worked for a living heart.

Setting the most captivating bit of rose-colored wood that ever dared call itself a hood about her bright hair, and wrapping a fur mantle around her slim, lithe figure, Margaret caught up a willow basket and set forth upon the tortuous path winding in and out along the bald-browed bluff and deftly down to the thickly wooded bottom land below.

Before leaving, however, the prudent, pretty little housewife gave a most comprehensive glance over all her domain, to see that nothing was by any possibility amiss.

Looking over the plump shoulder—no difficult matter to do, had one only been there, since the young wife was as much below the medium stature of woman as her husband was above it—the average height of mankind (what a strange law of compensation in the way of opposites love often includes!)—looking over Margaret's shoulder, there is to be seen a very pretty picture indeed, an "interior" fit to ravish an artist, more especially if the dainty young dame herself be comprised in the foreground.

The uncarpeted pine floor was white as soap and could scour it—"clean enough to eat off of," as the old wives would say.

A number of parti-colored mats and rugs, woven by Margaret's deft fingers from odds and ends of worsteds and flannels, lay scattered here and there, before the door, the snowy counterpane-bed, the dully shining old-fashioned chest of drawers, the window set deep in the log wall, and bearing on its broad sill a wreath of blossoming platanus, but the biggest and brightest of all stretched its prismic length upon the homely hearth.

No Turkish rug, no magic carpet out of the Arabian Nights, ever glowed more brightly than this piece of Maggie's handiwork in the crimson glow of the fireplace.

And what a rare radiance that fire sent forth; such a cheery, heart-warming smile of brightness that it lit up every nook and corner of the quaint, homely place. A smile? Nay, a broad laugh, that fairly gurgled aloud in the deep throat of the chimney, as if in grateful thanks for the warmth that came from its own face in the shining white porcelain, ranged on the pine dresser opposite, and in every nook and place of the wall, all burnished till they looked like silver, as well as the cold oval mirror over yonder, around which entwined a stray wreath from the luxuriant ivy vine growing in a huge rustic vase beneath, and climbing over the rough, white-washed walls, till its glossy green leaves touched the rafters.

This vase, and a little work-basket stand, and a half dozen brackets, set to speak of a cultivated taste and a refined before Maggie's low rocking-chair, wrought from the queerest things, (gnarled roots and stumps, and knotty boughs interwoven with grape vines and willow saplings).

Margaret's parting glance rested on all these, cheap and homely as they were, with an fond a pride as though they had been the furnishings of a palace,—aye, with fonder, for they were the fruits of love's labor.

"Nearly twelve," she murmured, looking at the elderly ticking clock on the tall mantel. The canary chirruped in his cage, swung between the snowy curtains of the southern window, as though to say good-bye to his little mistress, but somehow, she felt nearer and nearer the canary claimed the last fond glance of all, for the prettiest piece of furniture in the whole house had just been described. It was an old-fashioned carved four-legged, with a lovely, dimpled baby in it.

"Precious Maudie! mamma has half a mind to bundle her up good and snug and take her along," thought the young mother, stooping to kiss one pink cheek as softly as evening dew settles on the heart of a sleeping rose. "But then it would be so lonely, and she is so sound asleep, and besides," the little woman reluctantly acknowledged to herself, "the cliff is so long and steep, and Maudie is such a fat, heavy, little thing, that what with her and this big dinner, and I must stumble and fall, and anyhow, Mark would scold me for tiring myself out."

Still Margaret lingered, loth to go and leave the sweet little dreamer. Yet she had often done so before, and no harm had come of it. What harm could befall? A strange chill had touched the mother's heart as she asked herself, with an impatient murmur at her nervousness, she turned to leave the house.

A pitiful little white arrested her. An animated ball of white wool, with beads of black eyes, came bounding toward her.

"Poor little Poodle doggie! He couldn't go, no, he must stay and take care of baby for his money."

The little creature got up on his hind legs and barked in a doleful, small way, going unprompted through his meagre stock of taught "tricks" and came to her. He evidently thought that his mistress could not be proof against that, and she very rarely was, but this time she said:

"Get down, you little goose, and stop your begging. You can't go, I say. You must stay and take care of baby. Do you hear?"

Yes, he heard, and got down and trotted meekly like a dog, and the canary, and scrambled up through the open wrought railing, and lay down at the foot with a patient sigh, his wistful black eyes following every movement of his mistress until the door was very softly shut between her form and all the glow and warmth of the cozy cabin.

Bitterly cold and keen was the outer air, but the couple seated on the logs before the blazing fire down in the woods, bade defiance to wind and weather. Their hearts were too warm and light to heed the frost that only pinched a brighter hue into their faces, and never could blight the perpetual summertime of love in their hearts.

Maggie gaily spread a big white towel over a mossy flat rock near the fire, and set out her husband's dinner with a make-believe of being a colored waiter as a first-entrance compliment.

"Do you see, Bill of fare, eh?" and then she raised over the names of a dozen costly delicacies, things utterly unknown out on that wild frontier, called ing the good, honest doughnuts, and venison pie, and cold chicken, by such terribly tongue-twisting, outlandish names that it was a wonder they did not "suffer change into something new and strange," upon the spot.
