A DASHING EXPLOIT.

He owned he felt a little nervous, but he was determined.

"Take care," he went on; "I mean what I say. I am going to count. One—two—three—" At this critical moment a side door was flung open, and a lady flung her-self among them in a paroxysm of

"Agreel agree!" she cried. "Oh! this is another revolt of the negroes! Think of my poor father and mother, whom they murdered in St. Domingo. Alexandre owned that the lady's mistake was excusable, considering his own natural tint (deepened by violent browning from the sun) and the peculiar character of hair and voice. But we may wonder at the insensibility to ridicule which could prompt him to set down such a jest at his own expense. The truth was, he was so filled with vanity that all the nicer senses became blunted, and he was even unconscious vanity that all the nicer senses became blunted, and he was even unconscious of the roars of laughter which these foolish confidences produced. The commandant could not resist the entreaties of his wife. Alexandre declared that he had infinite respect for the lady, but entreated her husband to send her away and let the men finish the business. The poor commandant protested that self-respect must be respected. He could not decently yield to a single man. Alexandre then offered to sign a paper, to the effect

ly yield to a single man. Alexandre then offered to sign a paper, to the effect that the order had been extorted at "the mouth of the pistol-barrel." "Or would you prefer," he added, "that I should fetch two or three of my companions, so that you should seem to have yielded to a more respectable force?" The commandant accepted this proposal, and Alexandre left him, bluntly declaring that no advantage should be taken of the delay or he would return and "blow all their brains out," and that the whole party must give their parole of honor that they would remain exactly as they they would remain exactly as they

"Yes, yes," cried the lady. Alexandre made her a low bow, but declared that it was not her parole that he wanted. The commandant gave what was required of him, and Alexandre, hurrying away, speedily returned with two or three of his men, whom he placed in the court. Opening the window, he called to them and bade them inform the gentlemen inside that they were ready to fire at them at the first signal. ready to fire at them at the first signal, an appeal answered by the significant sound of the cocking of guns. The his desk, wrote out a formal order.
