

EMPERE EUGENIE.

The following extract from a sketch of Eugenie gives some interesting facts as to her ancestry:

In the streets of St. Juan de Dios, Malaga, there was, in the early part of the present century, a wealthy, intelligent, and very attractive family, residing in one of the most stately mansions. The master of the house was an opulent merchant from England, William Kirkpatrick, a Scotchman by birth. He had been the English Consul at Malaga, and had married a young lady of Malaga, of remarkable beauty, both of form and feature—Francisca Graviana, the daughter of one of the ancient Spanish families.

They had three daughters, all of whom inherited the beauty, grace and vivacity of their mother, blended with the strong sense and solid virtues of the father. The eldest of these daughters, Maria, was a young lady of extraordinary beauty. She was tall, with features as if chiseled by a Grecian sculptor, beaming with animation, with brilliant eyes, ready wit, and possessing perfect command of all the graces of language and the attractions of manner. Blended Saxon and Spanish blood circled in her veins and glowed in her cheeks. Her exquisitely molded form is represented to have been perfect.

Her two younger sisters, Carlotta and Henrietta, were also far famed for beauty, grace, intelligence, and all those virtues which give attractions to the social circle. Kirkpatrick was engaged in extensive commerce with England and America. His circle of acquaintance was consequently very extensive. All foreigners of distinction were welcomed to his hospitable board; and it was also the resort of the most refined and aristocratic native society of Malaga.

Among the guests who visited in this attractive family there was a Spanish noble, alike illustrious for his exalted birth, his large fortune, and his military prowess. A scar upon his face and a crippled limb were honorable wounds, which gave him additional claims to pre-eminence. He had joined the army of Napoleon in the endeavor to liberate Spain from the despotism of the Bourbons. He was then known by the name of Cipriano Palafox, Count of Theba. A strong attachment sprang up between this member of one of the old Spanish families and Señora Maria Kirkpatrick, the daughter of the wealthy English merchant. They were married in 1819.

This marriage secured for the beautiful and highly accomplished Maria all the advantages which wealth and rank could confer. The Count took his young and lovely bride, who was some years younger than himself, to Madrid, and presented her at Court. She had enjoyed the advantages of both a Spanish and an English education. Her beauty, intelligence and varied accomplishments rendered her a great favorite with the Queen, Maria Christina, and she was elevated to the most influential position among the feminine offices—that of first lady of honor.

Her husband, Count Theba, soon received additional wealth and honor, inheriting from a deceased brother the title and estates of the Count of Montijo. Maria's sister, Carlotta, soon after married an English gentleman, her cousin Thomas, the son of her father's brother, John Kirkpatrick. This gentleman had accompanied Wellington to Spain, and had served as Paymaster to the English army until 1814. As Maria's husband had espoused the cause of Napoleon, and had shed his blood in fighting against Wellington, the two extremes of political antagonism were represented in the family; and yet, so far as we can learn, harmoniously represented, for the passions which had inflamed that deadly conflict yielded to the ties of family affection. Both Thomas and his wife are now dead.

The third daughter, Henrietta, married Count Cabaras, a very wealthy Spanish sugar planter, residing near Yaguajay, Malaga. Her lot has been peculiarly tranquil and happy. She is probably at the time of this writing, residing in pleasant retirement with her husband on their beautiful estate in the south of Sunny Spain, in the enjoyment of opulence and high position.

The Empress Eugenie is the daughter of the elder sister, Maria Kirkpatrick, and of Cipriano Palafox, double Count of Theba and of Montijo. She was born the 5th of May, 1826. English and Spanish blood are mingled in her veins. She has enjoyed all the advantages of an English, a French and a Spanish education. She is familiar with the literature and the best society of the three realms, and in her person and features there are blended, in a remarkable degree, the grace and beauty of the highest specimens of the Spanish and Saxon races.

The death of her father, a few weeks before her birth, left Eugenie an orphan in her earliest infancy. But she was blessed with the training of a very excellent and highly educated mother. It is said that a part of her education was acquired in England, and that she has enjoyed the advantages of the best schools in France. Thus she speaks English, Spanish and French with equal fluency. There is no court in Europe where the claims of etiquette are more rigidly observed than in the royal palaces of Madrid. Eugenie, from childhood, has been so accustomed to all these forms, that she moves through the splendors of the Tuilleries with ease and grace which charm every beholder.

Three leaders of the Spanish revolution party called on Don Ferdinand concerning the vacant throne. The Prince said to them:

"You wish to make a king of me? Know, then, that I have already exchanged a crown for a Panama hat, it is because the former head-dress was a bore." Then, pointing out of the window to some magnificent vineyards, "See, I have turned vine-grower. I make capital wine, which is far better than politics, which turn sour."
