A Lively Locality.

I spent a night with some friends on the top of Vesuvius, freezing on one side and boiling on the other. We kept ourselves awake by the amusement of dodging the falling stones. About once in ten minutes the old mountain gave a shiver, then a burst—like forty thousand muffled cannon, if ever there was such a thing. At each burst a cloud of black smoke, in the shape of an inverted hay-stack, and about thirteen times the size of the Galt House, was driven into the air followed by a mass of livid flame that lighted the country for leagues around. Then boys, look out for the stones. Millions of tons are thrown hundreds of feet into the air, most of them falling back into the crater, but many varying in size from a pigeon's egg to a tobacco hogshead, land outside, and you must dodge—generally easy enough as they are of a white heat and show as plain as rocket stars. They tumble down the steep cone, hissing and steaming in the snow—the big ones breaking into fragments and flying like a bursting shell. Now, boys, is the time, ten minutes' interval. We rush up to the very edge of the abyss and look down to see further particulars—see "Dante's Inferno" but you spoil your boots; I did. You singe your moustache; I did. And you wish you were safely out of it; I did. You turn away sneezing, as if you had accidentally ignited a box of locofocos under your nose; for a moment all is dark, then the long twinkling rows of gas lamps in the streets of Naples seem to spring out of the ground under your feet, though miles away; then you see the lights in the little towns about the base of the mountains, in all save one, and that one the largest. Pompeii—with its great old temple, magnificent theatres, close built streets, and vast arena, is dark; the grim skeletons lying in their ashen beds alone keep their vigil there; their eyeless sockets need no light. No sight that ever I witnessed can equal a clear sunrise from Vesuvius. No one can imagine its grandeur; but you must try to, for I dare not attempt a description. As we stood gazing down on the roofless houses of Pompeii, the sun lighting its gray-colored wall—Torre del Greco, with its earthquake-shaken walls—I said: "We have nothing like this in America." "I'm glad of it," said one of the party; "It's awful shabby; don't think it pays." That young man was from Henry county, Indiana. With a pretty general destruction of boots and clothing, and the aforesaid loss of one of the handsomest moustaches in Naples, by your humble servant, we got down safely. Not so with another party who ascended from the Nola side. One of them had an arm broken by a falling stone; another a leg, in getting down. If you wish to know how to get up Vesuvius, consult a guide-book, or, better, try it. If you wish to know how to get down, let go your hold, and you'll come down.

Drinking Ice-water.

"Drink ice-water sparingly," is an important maxim to every person in summer. Experience shows that in order to quench the thirst, a little cool drink accomplishes quite as much as a large quantity. The hotter the day, the less should the stomach be loaded either with food or drink. A little observation will show the rule to be a good one both in respect of comfort and health. Let any one who doubts this try the following experiments, each for the six working days of a week of hot weather.

1. Every other day eat largely and drink moderately, and on the alternate days eat and drink sparingly.

2. Every other day drink largely and eat moderately, and on alternate days, as before, eat and drink sparingly.

3. Every other day eat and drink largely, and on the alternate days do both sparingly. The result of the experiments will show that in each case the alternate days when the stomach is least burdened the comfort is greatest, and the days when the stomach is loaded with the full meal and the largest amount of drink, the greatest discomfort is experienced.

"But what shall be done to quench the thirst in the hot days?" Drink only a little at a time. If the water is cold, a swallow or two will generally prove sufficient. When the sense of thirst returns, take another swallow, and so on. Bits of ice kept in the mouth or chewed until they melt, are much better than copious draughts of water. When the sensation of thirst is felt, delay quenching it as long as may be conveniently done. Try all this and test it for yourselves.—Home and Health.
