A current magazine has an illustrated article on the sleeping porches which have come to be a characteristic feature of many architectures. The sleeping out-door custom began with consumptives, but now numbers of perfectly well people in Denver have porches built especially for bedrooms. Denver says the author of the article is fond of porches, and prefers it over whenever the sun shines, and as a consequence more fresh air is consumed in Denver than in any other city of its size in the country. Denver builds its porches both on the front and on the back of the house. However, the back porch is not delivered over entirely to mosquito traps and other kinds of biting insects. There is likely to be a two-story affair with a railing around the second story. Here is a splendid place for dusting rugs and clothing. And here is a grand place to sleep of nights." People stipulate a sleeping porch in many advertisements for boarding places, and many new houses being built have a double sleeping room. The porches are screened against flies and some have adjustable awnings to be pulled down in case of rain, or to darken the place in the early morning. There is only one fault to be found with a sleeping porch, it spoils one for any other kind of a bedroom.

A lady who had lived in Burma which is a land of continual feasting and festive times, devised this pretty and unique evening for her guests. At the "feast of lights" season lanterns are in evidence everywhere, with any decorations of paper and Japanese or Chinese parasols, fans and lanterns. Small drawings were taken from the rooms, and covered with strips of crepe paper, pink and white being used, the effect over window and in doorways being beautiful. Large Japanese umbrellas were hung from the ceilings with a lantern suspended from each rib, in the diningroom fan poles of bamboo were used criss-cross up near the ceiling, and from these were suspended hanging just as flexible as they could be used. The candle shades were all tiny Japanese lanterns. The porch was screened by Japanese shades, which are called "checkers" in Burma. Hanging baskets filled with vines alternated with lanterns. Several bunches of bamboo hung in the dining room. A delicious rice curry was served in addition to the customary refreshments.

In this twinkling fairy land the hostess with three friends, received her guests. She and her assistants were gowned in oriental cotton robes, made after an exact copy of a Burmese woman's gown. They were bedecked with strings of beads and all sorts of ornaments.

Incense burned in quaint copper censers, and the men at the door were attired in white with a voluminous turban. Two stringed instruments furnished the music. All voiced this evening a great success.

Here is a funny little feature called "The Game of Nations." It will serve to get the thinking cap on and to furnish a half-hour's entertainment. On slips of paper to be given each guest write the questions, and when returned to hostess with the correct answers they should be:

1. The nation from which we start? 2. The nation for pupils? Subordination.

3. The nation for evil-doers? Condemnation.

4. The nation for actors? Impersonation.

5. The nation for theological students? Ordination.

6. The nation desired by monopolists? Combination.

7. The nation which indicates a class? Denomination.

8. The nation on a Crusade? Carrie Nation. This may be continued indefinitely.

MRS. JOHN E. MADDEN

MRS. ANNA E. MADDEN.

This is the latest picture of Anna E. Madden, the famous turfman, for divorce. This is one of the most sensational divorce suits that has appeared in the courts of this country in years. Mrs. Madden made a statement a few days ago in the divorce proceedings which may compel Mr. Madden to hand in his resignation to the Jockey club. She charges her husband with making false entries in his report to the Jockey club, and also of compelling her birth and registration of the horse Appaloosa.

4. The nation for evil-doers? Condemnation.

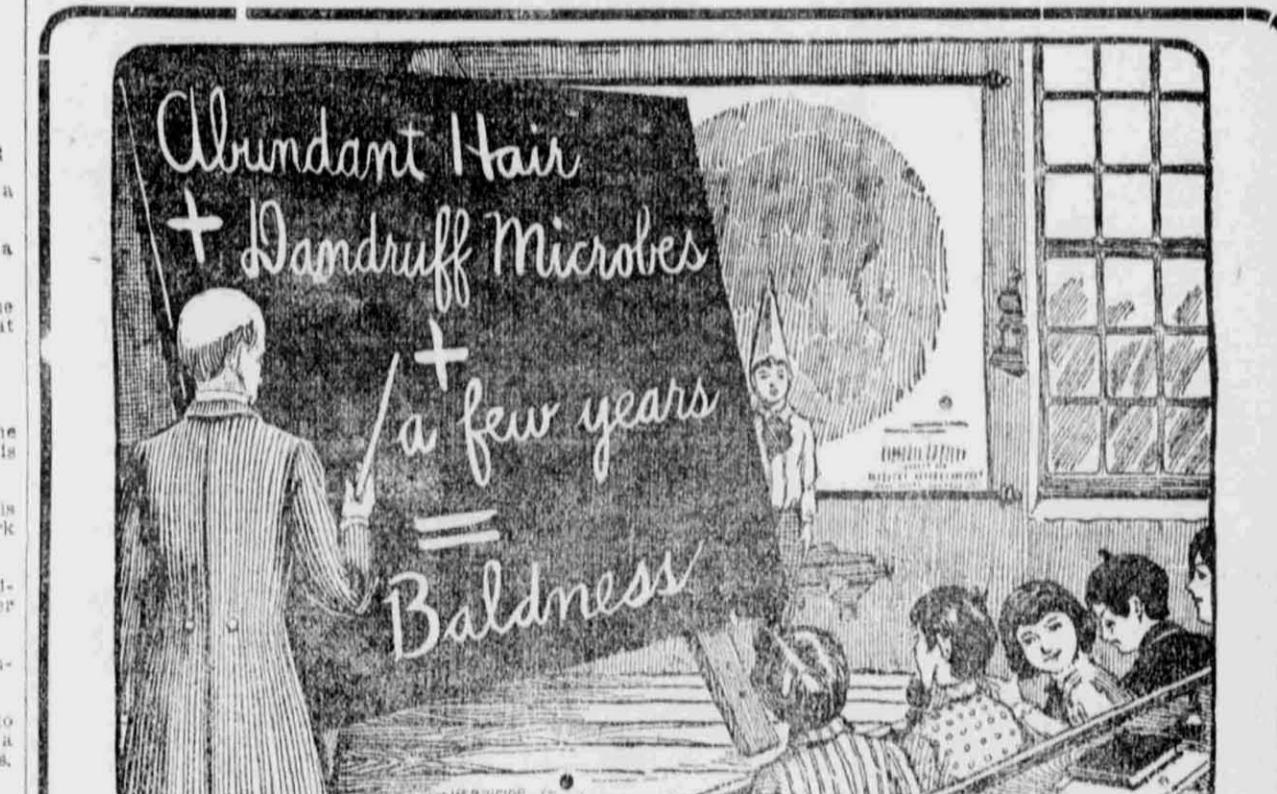

5. The nation for actors? Impersonation.

SCHOOL CHILDREN.

Every school child should know that baldness is a contagious disease, caused by a microbe. Prof. Umnau of Hamburg, Germany, discovered that dandruff, itching scalp, falling hair, and final baldness are produced by a germ or microbe that passes from one head to another, where it burrows into the scalp and by multiplying and extending deeper and deeper into the hair follicles, saps the life of the hair root and produces baldness.
