Diphtheria in Coalville. We learn from parties in from Coalville, that diphtheria proke out at that place one of the children, a little girl about eight years of age, succumbed to the disease; and now another is suffering from it. Day before yesterday it became necessary to quarantine the house of Samuel Fletcher in another part of the town, the malady having developed in one member of a nu merous family. The child had been alling for several days, but it had not been auspected before that it was diphtheria he had. The last day he attended school he had a high fever, and fears are now entertained that some of the children who were exposed to contact with him may have contracted the disease. The school has since been closed because of the danger of spreading the contagion.

This being so, when the complaint charges, in the language of the statute, charges, in the language of the statute, as in this case, the resorting to such a place for lewdness, it is good and meets every requirement of the rules of criminal pleading. As to the question of jurisdiction and the assertion of opposing counsel that the latest act would prevail, it was clear that Sec. 48 of the Civil Procedure Act, Laws of 1884, p. 162, was the last expression of the legislative will upon the subject, and that section in average tarms given in average tarms given in the law limited the number of a jury to six, the defendant could desection in express terms gives mand a jury of twelve, and any law to justices' courts jurisdiction of all misdemeanors punishable by a tice could not be ousted.
