SCIENTIFIC MISCELLANY.

The collapsible well or shaft offers news possibilities in marine exploration. This is composed of an observing or operating chamber, which is sunk into the water and lengthened out by successive cylindrical sections bolted together from the top, each section consisting of a series of rings with a flexible covering. The operating chamber is fitted with strong glass windows, and sleeves to enable the diver to manipulate apparatus on the outside of the shaft. In such a tube a diver can descend to considerable depth, remaining in free communication with the open air and working under ordinary pressure, and he seems to have within reach a considerable range of such work as cleaning hulls and exploring wrecks. Holsting and lighting apparatus can be lowered on the outside. Such a shaft is likely to afford new entertainment at amusement resorts, and gives a ready means for obseving submarine life and conditions. The collapsible well or shaft offers

An Egyptian mining center-proba-ly worked as early as 2500 B. C.bly worked as early as 2500 B. C.— was in the Eastern Desert, between the Red Sea and the Nile. The lately discovered remains described by C. I. Alford include small irregular stone huts, arranged in groups of two or three to towns large enough for 1,000 men. The ancient workings are buried in sand. The only vestiges of mining appliances are elliptical rubbing stones

The electric violin-player is one of the most ingenious of recent musical mechanisms, and this is entirely autothe most ingenious of recent musical mechanisms, and this is entirely automatic in action, unlike the familiar piano-players, which are somewhat guided by the operators. A perforated roll is drawn over the strings by a small motor. With the paper in place on the roller, contact brushes rest upout it, and as a perforation is reached, current from the brush energizes a corresponding electromagnet, producing the proper effect. A revolving disc, built up of layers of celluloid of the thickness of horsehairs, is automatically moved to give the action of the bow. A special magnet controls the staccate movement by pressing the discs suddenly against the strings; and four magnets—one for each string—yield pizzicato effects by causing a hook to fly back and pluck the string. An arm vibrated against the tail-plece gives the tremolo effect. Each string has 15 automatic fingers, which can be used singly or in combination, giving double, treble or quadruple stopping; or a solo may be played, with accompaniment on the lower strings. A very creditable violin performance can be had by simply turning a switch.

Carbon in an amorphous fused condition—real black diamond—is produced in a simple manner by a process lately patented in France by M. Bonnet. A vessel of bronze or other metal contains two carbon electrodes, between which is a rod of carbon over a small vessel of carbon bisulphide; and as the first current is passed the liquid is vaporized, generating a high pressure. Under this pressure and the temperature of a high tension current, the carbon rod is changed in a few moments to black diamond—the material so prized for drills and as an abraso prized for drills and as an abra-

The Pleiades have long formed an interesting test of vision. To ordinary eyesight six stars are visible, but keeneyesight six stars are visite. But he he eyed persons see seven and even 11 or more. The earth's interior is still a mystery, but physicists no longer regard it as a molten mass still radiating heat, into space, a different conception having been gradually forced upon them in the last 40 years by studies of the tides, of the propagation of earthquake waves, and, quite recently, of the possible heating from radium. Lord Kelvin and others have concluded that the earth is more rigid than steel, but less rigid than glass. There are reasons for assuming that a stony crust may encase a metallic nucleus, and Sir Oliver Lodge has shown that the earth's known average nucleus, and Sir Oliver Lodge has shown that the earth's known average density of 5.6 could be accounted for by supposing that the stony crust, with an average density of 2.5, extends to a depth of 500 miles, and encloses a core of metallic iron, with a density of 7. The Hon, R. J. Sturtt finds more radium in the rocks than would suffice to keep up the internal heat if the earth were of rock-throughout. He calculates that the crust is 5 miles thick, and that the radium gives it a bottom temperature of 1.500 degrees C., imparting a uniform temperature throughout the metallic nucleus, which does not contain radium.

Fatigue is now generally attributed to poisoning from muscular waste. It does not come on steadily, however, from the early morning until the stage of sleep is reached in the evening, and a new conclusion is that the first effect of the fatigue poison is one of stimulation. This would explain why mental faculties and muscular energies are often at their best in the evening. It is pointed out as quite probable that both nerve centers and muscle fibers may be rendered irritable, and that the same chemical agents may later narchemical agents may later nar-

A new wire of special advantage in electrical industries is obtained by a Parisian metallurgist through a perfected process of welding copper to steel wire. Great conductivity is combined with tensile strength and elasticity, giving a wire stronger than copper and smaller and less exposed to wind action than iron or steel of the same capacity.
