

The distance from Fairchild to Jack's rocky camp is twenty-five miles, over the roughest road, or rather trail, that I ever saw or dreamed of. The first ten miles are traveled by the regular Lead River wagon road, which is pretty fair, but after that the trail is taken, and then comes the hard part of the journey—over bluffs whose steepness makes it a miracle that anything animate can descend. The trail, through rocky gorges, that look at one thinks it impossible for even a mountain sheep to find foothold, is covered by the men, and across lava rock plains, and into narrow ravines and caverns, and through paths leads and turns and winds till one is lost in the rugged labyrinth. Almost every hour we were obliged to dismount and lead the horses through some yawning rocky chasm or down some steep declivity that no mounted man could descend. The horses, though, were so footed and got us through such places safely, though very slowly. Twelve miles of such heavy horse travel brought us to the summit of the last bluff before descending to the edge of the great bed of scoria, where the Malco chieftain has so long held thirty-nine millions of American people at bay. We reached this point at 4 o'clock. The snow storm had broken away, and the setting sun, directly behind us, shed a brilliant glow over the valley below. The snow-capped peaks of the mountains, the position of the lake was immediately to the left, its waters washing the base of the hills beneath us. Beyond, slightly to the left and across the glassy sheet of water, rose a range of high mountains, imbedded in a fleecy snow covering, and reaching back to the golden sunlight into the mirror-like surface at their feet. Immediately in front of us, rising from the level of the lake bed, of which so much has been said and written. As far as the eye could reach in one direction, and back to the rugged volcanic hills to the southward, this remarkable formation extended from our position at least one thousand feet above it. It had merely the appearance of a sage brush, plain as level as a marble floor. Not a single unevenness could be detected, except away off miles away on the lake shore the faintest suggestion of a rise showed. The lake, it was so slight that at first glance it failed to catch the eye. Fairchild pointed out this little break in the surface, and said that this was the scene of Jack's triumph.

That the place in which he defined the power of all the troops on the Pacific Coast. The party stood looking at the wonderful scene for fifteen minutes, and then again dismounting, prepared to descend the steep slope. A narrow trail led down in a zigzag direction, and over this the horses had to be led slowly, step by step. Down, down we went, groping cautiously, expecting almost every instant that an unseen slip or careless step would send some horse and rider whirling down the steep incline. Fifteen minutes of this perilous work, in which no one dared squelch his eyes off his own or his horse's feet, and we were at the edge of the lava.

But what a change! What from the seemingly bottomless sea of scoria, and piles of hard, jagged, flinty rocks, reaching as far as the eye could see, the level, smooth, and seemingly impossible, appeared through and around them, appeared like a track that a man would hardly undertake, to say nothing of a horse; but a little trail led off for a hundred yards or so, and then was lost in the lava, and just here, and just here, the Indian, Boggs, Charley, boldly led the way. Charley was mounted on a horse not yet two years old, but the little thing skipped over the hard, flinty, pebbly surface with the agility of an antelope. The trail was narrow, crooked, and so filled with lava rocks that the horses had difficulty in finding places to put their feet. Hence the progress was slow and tedious. Once in a while a clear place was found on the edge of the lava, but only for a few yards, and then the path led off again into the hard, jagged scoria, and through the thick, tangled sagebrush. Whenever a rise in the surface was reached we could see the lava where Jack's camp lay, rising higher and higher, and something of its terrible grandeur became apparent. We had gone a mile or more through this tedious, when suddenly, where the narrow trail turned around a ledge, we came full upon an Indian.

The Indian had seen us from behind a rock long before we had seen him, and he came forward to meet us. When Charley rode up he spoke a few words and sent him across the rocks by a cut off, to appease Jack who it was, for of course, every Indian in the camp had seen the party before they began to descend the bluff. The Indian bounded off to the left, and we followed him. It was "Squire Steele, and long before we reached the camp every Indian knew that we were there. As we proceeded, the Indians called our attention to many points of interest; the place where he and Dorris had their first interview with Jack in December last—the one at which Steele had been so much mortified; also where the troops were formed for the last fight, and the positions occupied by the different companies; the bluffs they carried, and those they didn't carry, where he and Dorris passed across the edge of the lake and formed their junction with Bernard, and many other things calculated to give one a complete understanding of that important battle to drive Jack from his stronghold. Finally the big ledge was reached, and turning up from the lava into a deep, rocky ravine, where the trail was so narrow that our stirrups scraped the flinty boulders and the horses were obliged to creep along, "Charley announced that we were within 300 yards of the Indian stronghold. Riding along slowly and with almost haled breath for the party now began to realize their position—some of the horses gave a snort, and pricking up their ears stopped. The Chinese correspondent's horse, which was immediately behind Charley's pony, seemed particularly averse to going ahead, and as his rider could do nothing to frighten him, he said, "Charley, what's the matter with that horse? He won't go." "Oh nothing," he said, "he's a dead soldier there in rocks. We tie up rocks there over two or three days, and that scare him. Come along." After another hundred yards were passed, the trail widened a little, and began to see signs of the proximity of the camp. Reaching a high ledge ahead the Indian battle flag pole planted. The flag that floated from it was the tail of a wolf, and as it dangled back and forth in the wind seemed the most significant word "Warner" had ever seen. A few minutes more and the party made a sharp turn in the rocks, which brought them suddenly on the Indian camp.

Consumption, Scrophulous, Etc.
It is a well known fact that the human system is composed of many organs, and that each organ has its own proper function to perform. If any one of these organs becomes diseased, the whole system is affected. Consumption, Scrophulous, Etc., are diseases which attack the human system, and which, if not cured, will lead to a premature death. It is therefore, of great importance, that every person who is afflicted with any of these diseases, should at once resort to a reliable remedy. The only reliable remedy for these diseases is the "Wagon Depot" medicine, which is sold by all the leading druggists in the United States.
