THE TELEGRAPH BOY'S STORY.

BY A. T. N.

[CONCLUDED.] Her cry rose wild and fearful, and the next moment she fell into her husband's and torn with anguish, Ralph Merton bore his poor wife to her chamber, and restored her to consciousness, with great difficulty. Nothing was said about the occurrence of the night, howabout the occurrence of the night, however. With a tacit understanding, it was made a forbidden subject. But henceforth Isabel Merton was never left alone. Wherever she was during the day or the night, either her husband of difference in the night the housekeeper was with her. Ralph Merton believed that his beautiful wife had lost her reason, through brooding over her Uncie's death, and refused to believe that she had indeed seen a spirit. FRENCH CALF SKINS. To humor her, however, the house was thrown open, at every part occupied, while at night it was brilliantly lighted from top to bottom. She dreaded the darkness, and quietude of the place, and by every effort possible, it was driven away. Thus there were frequent parties and gatherings at the old house, and it became quite gay in its old age. But the skeleton was in the closet still.

her life, and with the keenest anguish Ralph Merton saw that she could not long stand up against the dread appre-hensions she feit. Two months had nearly siapsed since the strange message had come over the wires to Isabel Merton, and the time was drawing near at hand, when, as the meesage said, the old sea captain would come for his niece, from beyond the grave. That the time might come and pass without occasioning new fears and expectations in Isabel, Mr. Merton proposed a party to be given, as he adroitly managed it, upon the night when the two months of expectancy would end. To this his wife consented, and extensive preparations were immediately commenced for it. Mr. Merten was threw upon her shoulders such a weight of responsibility and care that she had no time for anything else. How bright and inviting the old house looked that night! From the basement to the very garret it should with light, and the sound of music, mingled with the tread of feet, told what enjoyment the occasion afforded. The trees in the grounds were hung with lanterns, beneath were hung with lanterns, beneath which wandered stray couples, refreshing themseives after the heated dance, and the whole scene was one of joy and mirth. Among the guests Isabel Mer-ton moved and her laugh and wit won the charm of many a group. But the old fear clung to her still, and do what she would also her still, and do what she would, she could not banish it. Her husband watched her narrowly, and often he saw her start, turn deathly white, and gaze intently upon some spot for a moment. But the evening passed off pleasantly, and without an incident to mar its pleasure. At a late hour the guests despersed, and Raiph Merton congrammiated himself on the success of his plan, when he saw the flu-hed and pleased look of his wife. When all the guests had departed, Raiph and Isabet sought their own room while the servants closed the house. Having some errand with the butier the former peased on the way, while Isabel passed on up the broad stairs to her chamber. Scarcely a moment later the house resounded with terrible shricks, and the household, headed by Mr. Merton, rushed to Isabel's room from which the sounds

Before the door was reached the cries ceased, and believing that his wife had had another vision as he called it, and had fainted, he hurried forward and pushed open the door, but immediately full back and gazed with horror-struck fascination upon the scene within.

In her dressing-chair Isabel Merton sat, her head thrown back, her eyes distended, the most horrible terror pic-tured on her distorted features, and her hands seizing the chair with a vice-like grasp. And she was dead!

The awe-stricken servants dared not outer the room, but the old housekeeper crept in and felt the motionless pulse, and rapidly chilling flesh. Suddenly she turned and beckeed to Mr. Merton, who had stood in the door, like one stupefied, and obeying her mechan-leally, he stood before the corpse of his

"See," said the housekeeper, pointing to the dead woman's throat, and Ralph Morton, as he gased upon it, saw the ma- ks of the cruei fingers upon the fair Isabel Merton had been strangled to

The miserable husband was taken thence a raving maniae, and soon after died. No 98 has again fallen into disrepute. For many years it has stood vacant, and everything about it has gone to ruin. I hear that it is seen to be torn down and a handsome brown stone mansion built in its stead. I shall be glad when it is done, for the old house calls too vividity to mind the story I have related. I trust that in the other world Isabel Merton is enjoy-ing that peace she knew not for a long time in this life, and that for her there may be no more mysterious messages.

Of the strange occurrences narrated in this story I attempt no explanation. I have simply stated the facia, and leave all theories to the reader. But I must say, that though no believer in spirits, I have never been able to explain those occurrences to my own satisfaction.
