heard from was at the house of a Dr. Coxe. The latter upon being questioned, denied having seen any such parties, but said that three paroled rebel soldiers had applied there for accommodations and had been sent away. Coxe's servants, however, all asserted that the two men had staid there over night; that their master had entertained them in the most hospitable manner, and upon their departure next morning gave each a quantity of whiskey. The detectives next came upon the fugitives near the Sachiar Swamp, in Charles County. There they found a dilapidated shanty occupied by an old colored woman, who stated that on that morning two men, one of them with a crutch, had come out of the woods and asked for something to eat, offering to pay any sum for it. She being afraid of them, told them she had nothing; that there were no white people around there, and that they could get nothing to eat in that vicinity. The lame man then inquired the direction to the great swamp, which she gave, and the two went off. The shanty stands in a small clearing, surrounded on all sides by dense pine woods, with the exception of one side, bounded by the swamp. The Eighth Illinois Cavalry and a regiment of colored troops were immediately sent through the swamp in every direction, searching every thicket, but without finding any trace of the assassins, the latter evidently having secreted themselves in the pine woods and made their escape while the swamp was being scoured. On Sunday afternoon Booth and Harold crossed the Potomac at Swan Point, a short distance below Mathias point, and passing Port Royal en route to Louisa Court House, were captured, as previously described, at Garrett's place. Facts have come to light which show conclusively that Booth and his accomplices had, before carrying their plans into execution, decided upon the routes to be taken in making their escape. Maps, understood to be in the possession of the Government, and which are known to have belonged to these parties, bear distinct marks of the routes laid out by them. Booth and Harold were to escape to rebeldom and seek Jeff. Davis' protection who was finally to assist them in leaving the country. Harold, in a conversation with an acquaintance of his who resides in Maryland, some time previous to the murder of President Lincoln, made a remark to the effect that there was no extradition treaty between the United States and Spain, a remark that excited no special attention at the time, but in the light of subsequent events it would appear that Booth and himself contemplated shelter somewhere in the Spanish dominions. Surprise has been expressed that Booth selected such a shallow-pated blab-mouth as Harold as his nearest accomplice in so terrible a plot. This mystery, we think, may be explained in this way: Harold, a young man of idle, vagabond habits, was a good shot and a capital boatman, spending much of his time in gunning and fishing excursions in the lower counties of Maryland, acquiring in this way a thorough knowledge of the country, especially its by-paths, forests, swamps and creeks, sought only by the hunter and fisher. On the outbreak of the rebellion his knowledge made his services valuable in the capacity of a guide for blockade runners, and there is no doubt that he has been actively engaged in that business throughout the war. Doubtless he was recommended to Booth as a suitable guide in his flight, and that the acquaintance between them was formed in that way. But for the injury received by Booth in jumping to the stage, by which he was crippled, it is possible that the well arranged plan of escape might have succeeded. But the outraged flag of our country, trampled upon by Booth in his exit from the box, would seem to have been endowed with powers of volition, seizing him by the spur and causing him to fall crippled on the stage, whereby his flight was intercepted and his few days of Cain-like existence made days of agony intense. It is believed that had he not been immediately captured, death would have ensued from mortification of his broken leg—uncared for as it necessarily was and in constant use. Traces at points of his route indicate that he attempted to obliterate the tell-tale marks of his crutch in the earth, whereby his route might be traced, and that he hopped on one leg at other points, not using the crutch, to the same end.

—The Massachusetts fisheries have proved unusually productive this year. The Gloucester fishermen are replacing their old vessels with new and elegant schooners, which average $2,000 a trip.
