

POEMS EVERYBODY SHOULD KNOW.

HAIL COLUMBIA.

This song was written in 1778 to the air of "The President's March," and was sung at a benefit performance for a Philadelphia actor. It was composed with the idea of reconciling the political parties of the time—bitterly divided by the war with France—on the common ground of devotion to country. The author was Joseph Hopkinson, a Philadelphia lawyer, born in 1750 and died in 1829. "The Patriot of the Kox," one of the most popular ballads of the Revolution, was composed by the author of "Hail Columbia." To support the first verse and chorus of Hopkinson's song, Oliver Wendell Holmes, in 1857, wrote three additional verses and a chorus.

178.

(1) Columbia, happy land!
All ye heroes, heaven born land,
Who fought and bled in Freedom's cause,
Who fought and bled in Freedom's cause,
O'er the sombre war was gone,
gave the peace their valor won,
Let independence be our boast,
Ever mindful what it cost,
And ever ready to bestow
ever grateful for the prize,
Let us all reach the skies.

Firm, united, let us be,
Holding round our Liberty,
As a band of brothers joined,
Peace and safety we shall find.

Immortal patriots, rise once more,
Defend your rights, defend your shore;
Let no rude foe with impious hand nor no rude foe with impious hand overturn the rock on which we stand,
While offering peac e, sincere and just,
In Heaven we place a manly trust that truth and justice may prevail,
And every scheme of bondage fail.

sound, sound the trumpet of fame!
Let Hamlin's grand hymn arise,
there, there, with loud applause,
Ring thro' the world with loud applause!
Let every clime to freedom dear
Listen with joyful ear,
the trumpet skillfully peal,
in the fearful hour
of horrid war or guides with ease,
The happier time of honest peace.

Behold the chief who now commands,
Once more to serve his country stands!
The rock on which the storm was beat,
The rock on which the storm was beat his hopes are fixed on heaven and you.
When hope was sinking in dismay,
When gloom obscured Columbia's day,
His steady mind, from changes free,
Resolved on death or liberty.

185.

Look our ransomed shores around,
Peace and safety have found,
We're safe, we're safe, we're free,
Welcome friends who once were foes,
To all the concurring years have gained
A nation's rights, a race enthroned,
With a spirit bold,
Mindful of its glorious morn,
Let the pledge our fathers signed
Heart to heart forever bind!

While the stars of heaven shall burn,
While the ocean tides return,
Ever may the circling sun
Find the Many still are One!

graves deep with edge of steel,
Crowned with Victory's crimson seal,
All the world their names shall read,
And all the world their names shall read
Enrolled with his honor, his blood,
Whose blood for us, for all was shed.
Pay our dues their children's debt,
Love and honor, nor forget
Our nation's golden birth,
Guard the Ark of Liberty!

Hail Columbia, strong and free,
From whom eth us go,
They march triumphant still pursue,
With peaceful stride from zone to zone,
As make the Western land thine own,
From the Atlantic to the Pacific sea,
Let our grateful song arise,
Every voice its tribute lend,
In the loving chorus blend!

NIGHT OFF HATTERAS.

BY CLINTON SCOLLARD.

We saw the lightning-bolt, a glowing west,
With this thin fan of flame, the tempest after
A beacon glimmered like a ruddy star,
Across the ocean's undulating breast.
Here in this bay that harbors storm for guest,
Where the tempestuous gale, driving rain and sleet,
There was no sign of tumult, nought to move,
The night's pale witness and the sense of rest.

Parse ly open the wavy, over the sky,
Pores spread the visible arms of its wings;
It was as though the warning winds were a-wed;
We felt that from the void's immensity,
The brooding mystery that round it clings—
Learned the inscrutable whom we name God!

In Youth's Companion.

NOTES.

to—"J. B. Lippincott &amp; Co. are the publishers."

Owing to the great demand for advanced copies, McClure, Phillips & Co. have been obliged to postpone the publication of Henry Harland's new book "My Friend Prospero" until Jan. 18.

The shade of the authoress from Butte still falls upon us from the reflected light cast by a little volume called "Mr. Devil's Letters" to Mary MacLane. They are 37 in number, from various places in the Netherlands, and I am inclined to believe that they endeavor to impress the frankness and verbiage of the eccentric young woman who made such a stir in the world not long ago. The fact that they by no means equal Miss MacLane's fulminations is obviously nothing either for or against them. The volume is published in Chicago by the Inter-State Book company.

An English publisher a short time ago bought the rights of George Madden Martin's story of a girl's school days, "Emily Lou," from the American publishers, McClure, Phillips & Co. The sample volume had hardly reached the other side before the English house sent a cable order to double the edition. Since then McClure, Phillips & Co. alone once a week have received cables from the English firm "Please increase our orders...." "Emily Lou" has been out a year and is still selling in America, equally with any season's new books.

R. E. Young, whose name appears on the title page of that brisk western story, "Sally of Missouri," is Rose E. Young who has chosen to use non-controversial initials because they conceal the sex of the writer. Miss Young was at one time manager of a medical magazine and took her name appearing name because she found that business men dealt more readily with men than with women. "For my part," she says, "I felt more ready and more satisfied when my letters began to read 'Dear Sir.' Once in a while, however, the arrangement produced amusing complications, especially when some lady subscriber would persist in her ender scented correspondence until I had to beat a hasty retreat or explain myself. Once in a while an irate delinquent subscriber would handle me in a truly masculine way, as one did who wrote to me as follows: 'Dear Sir: You are a scoundrel and want to assure you that to my opinion you show a prudential dawn of intelligence beyond human in significance.' My publishers seem to think that I write like a man, which is rather incongruous when you consider that I can't sleep until I make sure about burglars in the most approved feminine way, and that I write best when munching chocolates."

McClure, Phillips & Co. have put to press the fourth edition of Mary Stew-

W. C. DUNBAR

As "Yankee Doodle" in Salt Lake's Old Dramatic Days.

art Cutting's "Little Series of Married Life."

The London Chronicle, in reviewing Hamlin Garland's last novel, "Hesper," says: "Mr. Hamlin Garland has one spontaneous and rare quality of the novelist—a genuine and compelling personality." His books are not like any other's else, but are his own hallmark, they remain in the memory as creations of their own class. They leave upon the reader the impression of real force and vitality, of insistency and persisting power, in the face of which only a starved and hide-bound criticism could refuse its meed of enthusiasm. For real power is not so often met with that can be easily accounted for or overlooked.

Henry Krehbiel's volume, "Studies in the Wagnerian Drama," is in demand at present, say the Harpers, because of its scholarly account of "Parsifal." Mr. Krehbiel inquires into the origin of the opera, and shows that it was an offspring of two previous dramas of Wagner's, one of which entitled "Jesus of Nazareth" is older than "The Victor." In his analysis of the later and greater opera, Mr. Krehbiel says: "The fundamental elements of the music of Parsifal" are suffering and aspiration. When they are apprehended, the ethical purpose of the drama becomes plain but not till then."

Senator Bevbridge's book, "Russia and the Russian," which recently bears on the most momentous world-question of the hour, the threatened war between Russia and Japan, will be published by Harper & Brothers on Dec. 11. The volume covers the Russo-Japanese situation now, in all its most important phases. Furthermore, Senator Bevbridge gives an account of Russia from his personal observation—the Russian laborers and bondsmen, Russian religion in its influence on state affairs, and the actual progress of the country in civilization, etc., all being treated of in turn, and from an American point of view. Senator Bevbridge's pen pictures of leading Russian statesmen are a feature of the work.

Gelett Burgess, author, with Will Irwin, of that fantastic volume, "The Reign of Queen Lulu," while said generally in all other respects, is like the common mortal in having a history. He had a mother and father; he was born in 1866; he was educated in the public schools and went to college at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Like great many other mortals he graduated. Then his career took on some Burgesian originality. He was for three months instructor in topographical drawing in the University of California and then a designer of furniture until he became the editor of the "Lark," in 1886, and made his fame by that piece of "precious ridiculousness," "The Purple Cow." Later he started two more periodicals, "Le Petit Journal des Refuses" and "Physique," and edited a bi-weekly on the lines of the "Sportster." He served a term in the London "Sketch" and has written with persistent continuities for the New York magazines. His first book was "Vivette, or the Memoirs of the Romance Association," his most serious effort, and a name in the "Commonwealth," a volume of poems, he says. As an artist he is known by his "Goops," as a literary impressario he has added to his own fame by bringing into prominence Yeho Noguchi, Oliver Onions, Will and Wallace Irwin and others.

Stanley Weyman's new book, "The Long Night," McClure, Phillips & Co., appears again this week among the six best sellers in New York. It has been mentioned in the lists consecutively now for about two months; practically since the date of its publication.

Norman Duncan is the author of "The Way of the Sun," which spent much of its time in New England and Labrador. Traveled on that coast is difficult and unconventional, chiefly by little boats that go from port to port picking up a passenger here and dropping one there. The passengers on these constiue twigs are few and chiefly masculine, so when Mr. Duncan and a friend built a vessel for a short summer trip to be granted that they would probably be sole occupants of the cabin which, however, contained two rows of bunks, one designed for men and the other for women. When Mr. Duncan and his companion turned in they did so leisurely, with a sense of full possession, sweeping curtains aside to give themselves ample air. Mr. Duncan was up early, calling the fresh air a decided neglige. He had scarcely finished his toilet before he saw his companion rise from his berth, with a look of horror in his face. The companion said no word but pointed across the cabin at a bunk where the curtains were drawn. From beneath the bunk appeared a pair of eyes, bright and shrewd, and a delicate feminine hand was seen to be gripping the doorknob of the curtain securely closed. Mr. Duncan gathered his garments together one swoop and dived for the enigma room, emerging half an hour later apologetic, crimson, and minus one sock, one shoe, collar and necktie.

Some evil minded reviewer has had the audacity to call this "avast-my-heart," that in dirty weather they come to you in socks and stockings and on fat days in duck. All of this is part of the numerous marine books the publishing houses are launching this fall. Joseph Conrad's "Falk," Norman Duncan's "The Way of the Sun," Dr. Rowland's "Sea Scamps," Albert Schenck's "Deep Sea Vagabonds," and Frank T. Bullen's "A Sack of Shaving"—there may be others. McClure, Phillips & Company desire to state that this story is untrue.

Miss Marie Manning, author of "Judit of the Plains," whose travels have always yielded material for good stories, is fond of telling of a family she encountered while taking a horseback trip in Tennessee. They were typical backwoods people, far removed from civilization, and in conversation it appeared that the eldest daughter Luella, had recently returned from a town, and had brought home a pair of curling-irons. The entire feminine portion of the family had since spent their spare time in hair-curling, but without avail. Not a curl would come. Miss Manning sympathetically inquired into the case, and discovered that they had never heated the curling-irons. Overjoyed at this discovery, general curling operations were promptly renewed, and at the end of the performance every woman of the family had a head, not only thoroughly curled, but equally well scorched.

"Hall's Hemeric Stories" for young readers, by Frederic Aldin Hall, Litt. D., professor of Greek in Washington University, St. Louis, American Book Co.

The pure and highly imaginative tales of Homer are in this book adapted for elementary reading and presented as a connected narrative. They will prove both entertaining and profitable reading for the children and a fruitful source of material for teachers. They will explain the numerous references and allusions to the characters and incidents of the Iliad and Odyssey often found both in classical and in current literature. The style of the narrative is clear and simple, and will both arouse the pupil's interest and hold his attention. The book is profusely illustrated, largely from the works of celebrated painters and sculptors. It is the most recent addition to the well-known series of Eclectic School Headings, and is especially intended for use in the sixth and seventh grades.

footnotes and complete vocabulary, and its size is well calculated to introduce the student to one of the principal figures in modern Spanish literature.

"The Beauty of Wisdom" is the title of a book compiled by James DeNormandie, pastor of the First Church in Roxbury. These daily readings for the use of individuals, families, and schools are selected from the Bible, Plato, Euripides, Confucius, Xenophon, Cicero, Montaigne—in fact, from the greatest writers of all time. These passages are so arranged as to give definite view to their ethical and moral tendency. "There is always another generation of young persons attracted to what the past generations have found true and beautiful," as DeNormandie says in his preface, and his book ought to attract many thoughtful young people. To serve another distinct purpose—"to provide another interest in some form of family service"—the selections are well adapted for reading aloud.

BOOKS.

"Marion's el Nino de la Bola," edited by Rudolph Schwilch, Instructor in Spanish at New Haven, Conn. A judiciously made abridgment of the semi-classical novel of the well-known Spanish author. The real interest of the romance is retained, but the prolix descriptions of minor characters, and the religious and political discussions, are in large part omitted. The picture of Spanish life is excellently portrayed, and the variety of types of the people, their insatiable curiosity, their love of illness and gossip, their weakness for all that is showy, and their continuous much ado about nothing. The editor has supplied all needful helps in the

"Daphne," is a new novel by Margaret Sherwood, author of "A Puritan Bohemia," and "An Experiment in Altruism." Miss Sherwood has written a delightfully fresh and graceful piece of American fiction. It is a simple, modest Italian background that makes it easy to understand. "There is always another generation of young persons attracted to what the past generations have found true and beautiful," as DeNormandie says in his preface, and his book ought to attract many thoughtful young people. To serve another distinct purpose—"to provide another interest in some form of family service"—the selections are well adapted for reading aloud.

"Daphne," is a new novel by Margaret Sherwood, author of "A Puritan Bohemia," and "An Experiment in Altruism." Miss Sherwood has written a delightfully fresh and graceful piece of American fiction. It is a simple, modest Italian background that makes it easy to understand. "There is always another generation of young persons attracted to what the past generations have found true and beautiful," as DeNormandie says in his preface, and his book ought to attract many thoughtful young people. To serve another distinct purpose—"to provide another interest in some form of family service"—the selections are well adapted for reading aloud.

"Daphne," is a new novel by Margaret Sherwood, author of "A Puritan Bohemia," and "An Experiment in Altruism." Miss Sherwood has written a delightfully fresh and graceful piece of American fiction. It is a simple, modest Italian background that makes it easy to understand. "There is always another generation of young persons attracted to what the past generations have found true and beautiful," as DeNormandie says in his preface, and his book ought to attract many thoughtful young people. To serve another distinct purpose—"to provide another interest in some form of family service"—the selections are well adapted for reading aloud.

"Daphne," is a new novel by Margaret Sherwood, author of "A Puritan Bohemia," and "An Experiment in Altruism." Miss Sherwood has written a delightfully fresh and graceful piece of American fiction. It is a simple, modest Italian background that makes it easy to understand. "There is always another generation of young persons attracted to what the past generations have found true and beautiful," as DeNormandie says in his preface, and his book ought to attract many thoughtful young people. To serve another distinct purpose—"to provide another interest in some form of family service"—the selections are well adapted for reading aloud.

"Daphne," is a new novel by Margaret Sherwood, author of "A Puritan Bohemia," and "An Experiment in Altruism." Miss Sherwood has written a delightfully fresh and graceful piece of American fiction. It is a simple, modest Italian background that makes it easy to understand. "There is always another generation of young persons attracted to what the past generations have found true and beautiful," as DeNormandie says in his preface, and his book ought to attract many thoughtful young people. To serve another distinct purpose—"to provide another interest in some form of family service"—the selections are well adapted for reading aloud.

"Daphne," is a new novel by Margaret Sherwood, author of "A Puritan Bohemia," and "An Experiment in Altruism." Miss Sherwood has written a delightfully fresh and graceful piece of American fiction. It is a simple, modest Italian background that makes it easy to understand. "There is always another generation of young persons attracted to what the past generations have found true and beautiful," as DeNormandie says in his preface, and his book ought to attract many thoughtful young people. To serve another distinct purpose—"to provide another interest in some form of family service"—the selections are well adapted for reading aloud.

"Daphne," is a new novel by Margaret Sherwood, author of "A Puritan Bohemia," and "An Experiment in Altruism." Miss Sherwood has written a delightfully fresh and graceful piece of American fiction. It is a simple, modest Italian background that makes it easy to understand. "There is always another generation of young persons attracted to what the past generations have found true and beautiful," as DeNormandie says in his preface, and his book ought to attract many thoughtful young people. To serve another distinct purpose—"to provide another interest in some form of family service"—the selections are well adapted for reading aloud.

"Daphne," is a new novel by Margaret Sherwood, author of "A Puritan Bohemia," and "An Experiment in Altruism." Miss Sherwood has written a delightfully fresh and graceful piece of American fiction. It is a simple, modest Italian background that makes it easy to understand. "There is always another generation of young persons attracted to what the past generations have found true and beautiful," as DeNormandie says in his preface, and his book ought to attract many thoughtful young people. To serve another distinct purpose—"to provide another interest in some form of family service"—the selections are well adapted for reading aloud.

"Daphne," is a new novel by Margaret Sherwood, author of "A Puritan Bohemia," and "An Experiment in Altruism." Miss Sherwood has written a delightfully fresh and graceful piece of American fiction. It is a simple, modest Italian background that makes it easy to understand. "There is always another generation of young persons attracted to what the past generations have found true and beautiful," as DeNormandie says in his preface, and his book ought to attract many thoughtful young people. To serve another distinct purpose—"to provide another interest in some form of family service"—the selections are well adapted for reading aloud.

"Daphne," is a new novel by Margaret Sherwood, author of "A Puritan Bohemia," and "An Experiment in Altruism." Miss Sherwood has written a delightfully fresh and graceful piece of American fiction. It is a simple, modest Italian background that makes it easy to understand. "There is always another generation of young persons attracted to what the past generations have found true and beautiful," as DeNormandie says in his preface, and his book ought to attract many thoughtful young people. To serve another distinct purpose—"to provide another interest in some form of family service"—the selections are well adapted for reading aloud.

"Daphne," is a new novel by Margaret Sherwood, author of "A Puritan Bohemia," and "An Experiment in Altruism." Miss Sherwood has written a delightfully fresh and graceful piece of American fiction. It is a simple, modest Italian background that makes it easy to understand. "There is always another generation of young persons attracted to what the past generations have found true and beautiful," as DeNormandie says in his preface, and his book ought to attract many thoughtful young people. To serve another distinct purpose—"to provide another interest in some form of family service"—the selections are well adapted for reading aloud.

"Daphne," is a new novel by Margaret Sherwood, author of "A Puritan Bohemia," and "An Experiment in Altruism." Miss Sherwood has written a delightfully fresh and graceful piece of American fiction. It is a simple, modest Italian background that makes it easy to understand. "There is always another generation of young persons attracted to what the past generations have found true and beautiful," as DeNormandie says in his preface, and his book ought to attract many thoughtful young people. To serve another distinct purpose—"to provide another interest in some form of family service"—the selections are well adapted for reading aloud.

"Daphne," is a new novel by Margaret Sherwood, author of "A Puritan Bohemia," and "An Experiment in Altruism." Miss Sherwood has written a delightfully fresh and graceful piece of American fiction. It is a simple, modest Italian background that makes it easy to understand. "There is always another generation of young persons attracted to what the past generations have found true and beautiful," as DeNormandie says in his preface, and his book ought to attract many thoughtful young people. To serve another distinct purpose—"to provide another interest in some form of family service"—the selections are well adapted for reading aloud.

"Daphne," is a new novel by Margaret Sherwood, author of "A Puritan Bohemia," and "An Experiment in Altruism." Miss Sherwood has written a delightfully fresh and graceful piece of American fiction. It is a simple, modest Italian background that makes it easy to understand. "There is always another generation of young persons attracted to what the past generations have found true and beautiful," as DeNormandie says in his preface, and his book ought to attract many thoughtful young people. To serve another distinct purpose—"to provide another interest in some form of family service"—the selections are well adapted for reading aloud.

"Daphne," is a new novel by Margaret Sherwood, author of "A Puritan Bohemia," and "An Experiment in Altruism." Miss Sherwood has written a delightfully fresh and graceful piece of American fiction. It is a simple, modest Italian background that makes it easy to understand. "There is always another generation of young persons attracted to what the past generations have found true and beautiful," as DeNormandie says in his preface, and his book ought to attract many thoughtful young people. To serve another distinct purpose—"to provide another interest in some form of family service"—the selections are well adapted for reading aloud.

"Daphne," is a new novel by Margaret Sherwood, author of "A Puritan Bohemia," and "An Experiment in Altruism." Miss Sherwood has written a delightfully fresh and graceful piece of American fiction. It is a simple, modest Italian background that makes it easy to understand. "There is always another generation of young persons attracted to what the past generations have