

DO INSURANCE COMPANIES WANT FEDERAL CONTROL?

NOT long ago there seemed to be a majority of the officers of the more important insurance companies who desired federal control. The indications recently are, however, that the sentiment has changed. The reason for this change is not entirely obvious. The fact that many of the best legal minds of the country seem to be of the opinion that exclusive federal control is beyond the power of Congress is probably the most powerful moving cause which has induced the insurance officials to change their views. They were anxious for federal control, if that control could be made exclusive. In other words, they are anxious to wipe out the 45 insurance departments of the various states and substitute in place thereof one federal department. They would greatly prefer one supervisor to 45. When, however, it was discovered that federal supervision would probably be in addition to the state supervision already in existence, the proposition was not attractive. Then again, it is urged that in case of state supervision becoming too burdensome in any particular state, a company might withdraw from that state. On the other hand there could be no withdrawal no matter what the federal supervision might be.

Whether Congress has the power to declare insurance to be "commerce," or "interstate commerce," so that the declaration will be binding on the supreme court, is a question on which good lawyers absolutely and entirely disagree. It probably never will be settled to the satisfaction of anyone, until Congress passes the law and the supreme court determines its validity. In the meantime those who favor federal supervision of insurance are probably going to meet very strenuous opposition, unless the insurance companies can be sure that the federal control will be exclusive and not merely an addition to the control already exercised by the commissioners of the various states.—American Law Times.

He Might Have Known.
She entered the stationer's gally. She was radiant in an ermine stole, her uncle's wedding gift.

"Have you any wax for flowers?" she said to the clerk. He smiled indulgently. "No'm," he answered. "We have only sealing wax."
"Oh, that won't do at all," she said. "You see, we are going to give a dance, and I want to wax the floor, not the ceiling."
