

THIS Salt Lake playhouse are holding their own blithely in the face of the announcements of summer amusements and the general activity in evidence at the resorts prior to the ushering in of the outdoor life. With the exception of the Salt Lake Theater, which has been dreck this week, the other houses have experienced good business, and numerically the audiences have been all that could be desired at this time of the year. As the season draws to a close much of the amusement calendar is putting the best foot forward. The bill at the Orpheum this week is the best offered for some months and, if advertising criticisms from exchanges are in the Kita-han troupe of Japanese acrobats are, in themselves, a distinct and interesting feature. But the Kita-han troupe, consisting of eight Japanese acrobats and equilibrists, is said to be one of the most remarkable and attractive organizations ever imported from the Orient. The "Puff House," "A Little Girl and a Teddy Bear," isn't exactly a mystery affair but it is one of those catchy little things that takes the old folks back many years, while it is a source of greatest joy and hilarity to the youngsters. G. Herbert Mitchell is a talented baritone and a favorite among the young girls, while Joanie seems to do every last trick in the way of gravity and dash and then smiles at his mischievousness. He has been here before, but since his last trip he has toured Great Britain and returns with an entirely new assortment of equilibrists, acrobats and barrel-rollers, etc. Miss Minnie Kaufmann is justly termed a skitful and graceful cyclist and holds the undisputed title of the foremost lady trick rider in the world. The orchestra—what would be the bill without it—is going to hand out some new and choice selections in the way of overtures and compositions while the kindred promises some brilliant overture will be played, also the fascinating "Seguidilla," the "Cigarette Girls" chorus and the "Habanera," the latter a genuine Spanish tune borrowed by Bizet from the Basque land. There will also be a Spanish dance introduced into the second act scene. There should be plenty of picturesque material for the Mack players in this gay drama with its scenes of Sevilla's festival and bull fight and with its background of soldiers, gypsies and smugglers. The Gipsy camp in the third act with its rugged mountain environment and the daring豪情 of the gypsies should be a picture of pictures. The comedy scenes of the gypsy girls and Callie Gates will have a good part as Dolores, the unfortunate sweetheart of Jose. Arling Alcine will play the gipsy chief and Clay Clement, Jr., the Spanish colonel. Besides the whole company of 16 members there will be a considerable number of extra people as soldiers, gypsies, smugglers and populace. It is the in-any criterion, next week's bill is an exceptionally strong one. The same holds good at the Colonial and at the Bungalow. "The Liars," which closed tonight, is making a hit and "The Bus" goes on to the top of the Colonial next week at popular prices. Miss Mary Hall takes her players over to the Bungalow next week where she will put on an ambitious production of "Carmen." At the Grand the Arlington company presents the return of Mr. McEwan, the hypnotist who did big business there for two weeks recently. The Lyric, too, has indulged in a prosperity week with some really strong non-trust motion pictures and other features.

SIX SAUCY FLIRTY GIRLIES.
In "The Burgomaster." Colonial All Next Week.

Next week's Orpheum bill with approximately 30 records on the stage engaged in the various acts, will take on the nature of an opera. Of the seven numbers on the bill six are "full stage" and more than half of them carry their own scenery. Jolly Fanny Rice is the headliner. She has an act, with her miniature stage on which she depicts various characters that is clever and clever. In addition she is a witty woman, clever at repartee with a keen sense of humor. "In the Subway," is the title of a comedy sketch by Edgar Allan Woolf, presented by Miss Violet Black and company. There is an unique scene, showing New York's underground tunnel of traffic, "the tube." The gorgeous draperies and rugs used now and clever moving pictures. Next week at the Colonial theater promises to be a series of novelty displays, the first out of the ordinary. In the first place, Louis Manager Grant has arranged to present that stirring musical success "The Burgomaster," for the first time anywhere at the Colonial's seals of prices. On Monday night, to decide a wager, the stage hands will endeavor to "go against" the manager and see who will win the first act of "The Burgomaster" in full view of the audience. The setting and striking of a scene in full view of an audience is sure enough a departure in itself, and when it is understood that alertness and precision are imperative in the present case, it should prove all the more interesting. "The Burgomaster" will be presented for the one thousandth time at the Thursday matinee, and to mark the event beautiful Colonial plate will be given free as souvenirs to every lady attending. Several theater parties are being arranged for in honor of Harry Herman, who is a well known Knight of Columbus, and also an Elk.

Special attention will be paid to the musical features of next week's "Carmen" revival at the Bungalow. This famous romance will be given with a great deal of incidental music from the opera of the same name by Georges Bizet, which has been such a popular favorite since its first performance at the Paris Opera Comique in 1875. The tention to make the production a memorable one.

The four weeks' engagement of the Arlington players at the Grand closes this evening. It has been successful from every point of view. The attendance this week has been excellent and those who have witnessed the production of "An Orphan's Prayer" say that it is the best piece that this company has put out. Next week the Great McEwan will be the attraction with entertainment which runs the gamut from sleight of hand and cabinet tricks to straight hypnotism. McEwan, on his former visit here, was a factor in packing the house at every performance and creating considerable discussion generally.

THEATER GOSSIP

Margaret Anglin is said to have rejected a French play by Léon de Pongy, on the ground that it is too Puritan.

A new national theater is to be built in the City of Mexico, to cost $3,000,000, which sum has been appropriated by the government.

Frederick Warde ended his lecture tour at Hutchinson, Kan., last week, and returned to New York, where he will remain until May 1.

The Shuberts have secured for production a comedy by Ferdinand Gottschalk, entitled "The Europeans." Gottschalk is an actor in John Drew's company.

Reports come from New York to the effect that Henry Miller has decided to "shelve" "The Faith Healer" for the rest of the season, and may take it up only after far after it has been written. The play is by William Vaughn Moody, author of "The Great Divide."

Forbes Robertson and Gertrude Elliott will tour this country during the season in Jerome R. Jerome's "The Passing If the Third Floor Back"—a play which has some similarity to "The Servant in the House." They will start with an engagement at Sister Maxine's New York theater.

A prior right exists to the title "None But the Bras." Miss Constance Fletcher's new play, founded on the La Bruyere de Langres, will be called "The English Companion." Rehearsals of the piece are in progress, and its production at the London Lyric will take place in about two weeks.

A feature of the benefit given for Miss Clara Morris in New York yesterday afternoon was the performance of the second act of "Lady Windermere's Fan," the cast including Miss Virginia Harwood, Frances Starr, Elsie Janis, Dorothy Clegg, Mrs. Proctor Otis, Messrs. E. M. Holland, Edwin Arden, Robert Warwick, Lawrence D'Orsay and Edgar Norton.

William Collier reached the end of his long engagement at the British theater, New York, recently. For nearly six months he has played "The Patriot" to a succession of crowded houses. Now he will proceed to no

ETTA LOCKHART AND GAY SOUBRETTEES.
In "The Burgomaster" Colonial Theater All Next Week.

quire an English accent preparatory to his invasion of London in the same farce. At the Garrick he will be followed by the Clyde Fitch comedy, "The Happy Marriage," in which the leading role is taken by Miss Doris Keane, an Evanston girl.

Miss Billie Burke has stolen by stealth into the ranks of play writers. Among the twenty-three dramatic compositions registered at the Bureau of Copyrights in Washington is a Western Nature Studies" and the author is Billie Burke. And she did it without the knowledge or consent of her press representative, too. Miss Burke is not the only representative of the stage in the published list of writers. Lester Longstreet is credited with two effusions, "A Stormy Hour" and "The Vital Question," and Frederick Truesdell hopes to collect royalties on "What Is Love For?"

Margaret Anglin will complete her tour of the U. S. when she lands in New York City about the middle of next month. She opens in Boston in September next, with "The Awakening of Helena Riche," after an absence from the American stage of close upon two years. The English actress will be in the U. S. last week purchased by Miss Anglin's agent from Mrs. DeLand and the dramatic author, Miss Charlotte Thompson. The actress intends to appear in it herself in London, following its run here. She writes from London that before coming home she will perform the play at the Theater Antoine in Paris, for copyright purposes.

been made to capture the music-hall public by a wholly American show. The English have had their tastes cultivated, however, by the numerous single stars who have twinkled in the musical firmament. The display of an entire metropolis will be held up to the world with applause, and it is to be hoped that the box office will justify the venture. American humor for British consumption has to be toned down somewhat. I had a little chat recently with one of the managers of the Palace music hall—perhaps the most select institution of its kind in Europe. Palace audiences are composed of the intellectual elite of the theater-going English world.

HIS JOKES WERE LOST.

"Even for our audiences," said the Palace manager, "American humor is often too swift. We had a man here recently who was really a genius. He could make any audience in America laugh. He was a brilliant joker. But in London he was more or less of a failure. He rushed into an aeroplane; and would spring one 'bang' after another without giving the first punch time to sink in. The consequence was somewhat painful. The audience did not respond; many of them appeared to be dead and to drop him. I won't mention his name, but I will consider him one of the best men in the business. Anything that comes to London from America will have to come down to a sort of English tone; otherwise it will not succeed. Jokes must not have too fine an edge on them for our people. The Britisher is a kindly cuss and wants humor of a honest kind almost verging on the farcical. Jokes for English consumption have to be labeled."

CURTIS BROWN.

general meeting recently rechristened itself the Playwrights' Association. Curiously enough, this association is enthusiastically supported by women playwrights, who are anxious to get their work before the public. The scheme is on somewhat more philanthropic lines than the afternoon theater; and is not quite so ambitious. While it will aid the production of the works of the obscure and struggling playwrights, it does not hold forth. At the same time, it serves a most useful purpose, and fits, so to speak, the proverbial long-felt want. Prominent in the association are: Cyril Maude, C. Aubrey Smith and Allan Aycock, who have volunteered as co-presidents of unrepresented playwrights. With such practical men to pass judgment on manuscripts, not only will a vast amount of unproduvable work be eliminated from the field forever, but undoubtedly gems will be discovered in the heaps of rubbish that will well repay the labor spent on looking for them. Members will be assessed a sum sufficient to see in three plays each, and the most suitable of the whole lot will be strongly recommended to managers. Someone has suggested that there should be a combination between the Afternoon theater and the Playwrights' association, the former to produce the plays discovered by the latter.

Under all the circumstances it looks as if the unknown aspirant to dramatic fame were to have a chance in general meeting recently rechristened itself the Playwrights' Association. Curiously enough, this association is enthusiastically supported by women playwrights, who are anxious to get their work before the public. The scheme is on somewhat more philanthropic lines than the afternoon theater; and is not quite so ambitious. While it will aid the production of the works of the obscure and struggling playwrights, it does not hold forth. At the same time, it serves a most useful purpose, and fits, so to speak, the proverbial long-felt want. Prominent in the association are: Cyril Maude, C. Aubrey Smith and Allan Aycock, who have volunteered as co-presidents of unrepresented playwrights. With such practical men to pass judgment on manuscripts, not only will a vast amount of unproduvable work be eliminated from the field forever, but undoubtedly gems will be discovered in the heaps of rubbish that will well repay the labor spent on looking for them. Members will be assessed a sum sufficient to see in three plays each, and the most suitable of the whole lot will be strongly recommended to managers. Someone has suggested that there should be a combination between the Afternoon theater and the Playwrights' association, the former to produce the plays discovered by the latter.

Under all the circumstances it looks as if the unknown aspirant to dramatic fame were to have a chance in

general meeting recently rechristened itself the Playwrights' Association. Curiously enough, this association is enthusiastically supported by women playwrights, who are anxious to get their work before the public. The scheme is on somewhat more philanthropic lines than the afternoon theater; and is not quite so ambitious. While it will aid the production of the works of the obscure and struggling playwrights, it does not hold forth. At the same time, it serves a most useful purpose, and fits, so to speak, the proverbial long-felt want. Prominent in the association are: Cyril Maude, C. Aubrey Smith and Allan Aycock, who have volunteered as co-presidents of unrepresented playwrights. With such practical men to pass judgment on manuscripts, not only will a vast amount of unproduvable work be eliminated from the field forever, but undoubtedly gems will be discovered in the heaps of rubbish that will well repay the labor spent on looking for them. Members will be assessed a sum sufficient to see in three plays each, and the most suitable of the whole lot will be strongly recommended to managers. Someone has suggested that there should be a combination between the Afternoon theater and the Playwrights' association, the former to produce the plays discovered by the latter.

Under all the circumstances it looks as if the unknown aspirant to dramatic fame were to have a chance in

general meeting recently rechristened itself the Playwrights' Association. Curiously enough, this association is enthusiastically supported by women playwrights, who are anxious to get their work before the public. The scheme is on somewhat more philanthropic lines than the afternoon theater; and is not quite so ambitious. While it will aid the production of the works of the obscure and struggling playwrights, it does not hold forth. At the same time, it serves a most useful purpose, and fits, so to speak, the proverbial long-felt want. Prominent in the association are: Cyril Maude, C. Aubrey Smith and Allan Aycock, who have volunteered as co-presidents of unrepresented playwrights. With such practical men to pass judgment on manuscripts, not only will a vast amount of unproduvable work be eliminated from the field forever, but undoubtedly gems will be discovered in the heaps of rubbish that will well repay the labor spent on looking for them. Members will be assessed a sum sufficient to see in three plays each, and the most suitable of the whole lot will be strongly recommended to managers. Someone has suggested that there should be a combination between the Afternoon theater and the Playwrights' association, the former to produce the plays discovered by the latter.

Under all the circumstances it looks as if the unknown aspirant to dramatic fame were to have a chance in

general meeting recently rechristened itself the Playwrights' Association. Curiously enough, this association is enthusiastically supported by women playwrights, who are anxious to get their work before the public. The scheme is on somewhat more philanthropic lines than the afternoon theater; and is not quite so ambitious. While it will aid the production of the works of the obscure and struggling playwrights, it does not hold forth. At the same time, it serves a most useful purpose, and fits, so to speak, the proverbial long-felt want. Prominent in the association are: Cyril Maude, C. Aubrey Smith and Allan Aycock, who have volunteered as co-presidents of unrepresented playwrights. With such practical men to pass judgment on manuscripts, not only will a vast amount of unproduvable work be eliminated from the field forever, but undoubtedly gems will be discovered in the heaps of rubbish that will well repay the labor spent on looking for them. Members will be assessed a sum sufficient to see in three plays each, and the most suitable of the whole lot will be strongly recommended to managers. Someone has suggested that there should be a combination between the Afternoon theater and the Playwrights' association, the former to produce the plays discovered by the latter.

Under all the circumstances it looks as if the unknown aspirant to dramatic fame were to have a chance in

general meeting recently rechristened itself the Playwrights' Association. Curiously enough, this association is enthusiastically supported by women playwrights, who are anxious to get their work before the public. The scheme is on somewhat more philanthropic lines than the afternoon theater; and is not quite so ambitious. While it will aid the production of the works of the obscure and struggling playwrights, it does not hold forth. At the same time, it serves a most useful purpose, and fits, so to speak, the proverbial long-felt want. Prominent in the association are: Cyril Maude, C. Aubrey Smith and Allan Aycock, who have volunteered as co-presidents of unrepresented playwrights. With such practical men to pass judgment on manuscripts, not only will a vast amount of unproduvable work be eliminated from the field forever, but undoubtedly gems will be discovered in the heaps of rubbish that will well repay the labor spent on looking for them. Members will be assessed a sum sufficient to see in three plays each, and the most suitable of the whole lot will be strongly recommended to managers. Someone has suggested that there should be a combination between the Afternoon theater and the Playwrights' association, the former to produce the plays discovered by the latter.

Under all the circumstances it looks as if the unknown aspirant to dramatic fame were to have a chance in

general meeting recently rechristened itself the Playwrights' Association. Curiously enough, this association is enthusiastically supported by women playwrights, who are anxious to get their work before the public. The scheme is on somewhat more philanthropic lines than the afternoon theater; and is not quite so ambitious. While it will aid the production of the works of the obscure and struggling playwrights, it does not hold forth. At the same time, it serves a most useful purpose, and fits, so to speak, the proverbial long-felt want. Prominent in the association are: Cyril Maude, C. Aubrey Smith and Allan Aycock, who have volunteered as co-presidents of unrepresented playwrights. With such practical men to pass judgment on manuscripts, not only will a vast amount of unproduvable work be eliminated from the field forever, but undoubtedly gems will be discovered in the heaps of rubbish that will well repay the labor spent on looking for them. Members will be assessed a sum sufficient to see in three plays each, and the most suitable of the whole lot will be strongly recommended to managers. Someone has suggested that there should be a combination between the Afternoon theater and the Playwrights' association, the former to produce the plays discovered by the latter.

Under all the circumstances it looks as if the unknown aspirant to dramatic fame were to have a chance in

general meeting recently rechristened itself the Playwrights' Association. Curiously enough, this association is enthusiastically supported by women playwrights, who are anxious to get their work before the public. The scheme is on somewhat more philanthropic lines than the afternoon theater; and is not quite so ambitious. While it will aid the production of the works of the obscure and struggling playwrights, it does not hold forth. At the same time, it serves a most useful purpose, and fits, so to speak, the proverbial long-felt want. Prominent in the association are: Cyril Maude, C. Aubrey Smith and Allan Aycock, who have volunteered as co-presidents of unrepresented playwrights. With such practical men to pass judgment on manuscripts, not only will a vast amount of unproduvable work be eliminated from the field forever, but undoubtedly gems will be discovered in the heaps of rubbish that will well repay the labor spent on looking for them. Members will be assessed a sum sufficient to see in three plays each, and the most suitable of the whole lot will be strongly recommended to managers. Someone has suggested that there should be a combination between the Afternoon theater and the Playwrights' association, the former to produce the plays discovered by the latter.

Under all the circumstances it looks as if the unknown aspirant to dramatic fame were to have a chance in

general meeting recently rechristened itself the Playwrights' Association. Curiously enough, this association is enthusiastically supported by women playwrights, who are anxious to get their work before the public. The scheme is on somewhat more philanthropic lines than the afternoon theater; and is not quite so ambitious. While it will aid the production of the works of the obscure and struggling playwrights, it does not hold forth. At the same time, it serves a most useful purpose, and fits, so to speak, the proverbial long-felt want. Prominent in the association are: Cyril Maude, C. Aubrey Smith and Allan Aycock, who have volunteered as co-presidents of unrepresented playwrights. With such practical men to pass judgment on manuscripts, not only will a vast amount of unproduvable work be eliminated from the field forever, but undoubtedly gems will be discovered in the heaps of rubbish that will well repay the labor spent on looking for them. Members will be assessed a sum sufficient to see in three plays each, and the most suitable of the whole lot will be strongly recommended to managers. Someone has suggested that there should be a combination between the Afternoon theater and the Playwrights' association, the former to produce the plays discovered by the latter.

Under all the circumstances it looks as if the unknown aspirant to dramatic fame were to have a chance in

general meeting recently rechristened itself the Playwrights' Association. Curiously enough, this association is enthusiastically supported by women playwrights, who are anxious to get their work before the public. The scheme is on somewhat more philanthropic lines than the afternoon theater; and is not quite so ambitious. While it will aid the production of the works of the obscure and struggling playwrights, it does not hold forth. At the same time, it serves a most useful purpose, and fits, so to speak, the proverbial long-felt want. Prominent in the association are: Cyril Maude, C. Aubrey Smith and Allan Aycock, who have volunteered as co-presidents of unrepresented playwrights. With such practical men to pass judgment on manuscripts, not only will a vast amount of unproduvable work be eliminated from the field forever, but undoubtedly gems will be discovered in the heaps of rubbish that will well repay the labor spent on looking for them. Members will be assessed a sum sufficient to see in three plays each, and the most suitable of the whole lot will be strongly recommended to managers. Someone has suggested that there should be a combination between the Afternoon theater and the Playwrights' association, the former to produce the plays discovered by the latter.

Under all the circumstances it looks as if the unknown aspirant to dramatic fame were to have a chance in

general meeting recently rechristened itself the Playwrights' Association. Curiously enough, this association is enthusiastically supported by women playwrights, who are anxious to get their work before the public. The scheme is on somewhat more philanthropic lines than the afternoon theater; and is not quite so ambitious. While it will aid the production of the works of the obscure and struggling playwrights, it does not hold forth. At the same time, it serves a most useful purpose, and fits, so to speak, the proverbial long-felt want. Prominent in the association are: Cyril Maude, C. Aubrey Smith and Allan Aycock, who have volunteered as co-presidents of unrepresented playwrights. With such practical men to pass judgment on manuscripts, not only will a vast amount of unproduvable work be eliminated from the field forever, but undoubtedly gems will be discovered in the heaps of rubbish that will well repay the labor spent on looking for them. Members will be assessed a sum sufficient to see in three plays each, and the most suitable of the whole lot will be strongly recommended to managers. Someone has suggested that there should be a combination between the Afternoon theater and the Playwrights' association, the former to produce the plays discovered by the latter.

Under all the circumstances it looks as if the unknown aspirant to dramatic fame were to have a chance in general meeting recently rechristened itself the Playwrights' Association. Curiously enough, this association is enthusiastically supported by women playwrights, who are anxious to get their work before the public. The scheme is on somewhat more philanthropic lines than the afternoon theater; and is not quite so ambitious. While it will aid the production of the works of the obscure and struggling playwrights, it does not hold forth. At the same time, it serves a most useful purpose, and fits, so to speak, the proverbial long-felt want. Prominent in the association are: Cyril Maude, C. Aubrey Smith and Allan Aycock, who have volunteered as co-presidents of unrepresented playwrights. With such practical men to pass judgment on manuscripts, not only will a vast amount of unproduvable work be eliminated from the field forever, but undoubtedly gems will be discovered in the heaps of rubbish that will well repay the labor spent on looking for them. Members will be assessed a sum sufficient to see in three plays each, and the most suitable of the whole lot will be strongly recommended to managers. Someone has suggested that there should be a combination between the Afternoon theater and the Playwrights' association, the former to produce the plays discovered by the latter.