Correspondence.

Rockville, Kane Co.,
March 16, 1868.

Editor Deseret News.—Dear Sir: One of the many interesting features of a home newspaper, is the correspondence of a few of its numerous readers. I love to read of the movements of the Elders abroad, in their conflicts with the superstitions of the age, and the welfare of the people in the various settlements of our mountain Territory.

Rockville is situated upon the north bank of the Rio Virgen, about twenty-one miles east of the road leading from Salt Lake City to Los Angeles, via St.
George. The high waters of last December swept away a considerable portion of the bottom-land, thereby curtailing the operations of many of our farmers.
The crops the past season were only medium, that of cotton, falling far short of an average yield.

With the exception of a few lingering cases of whooping cough among children, the health of the people is generally good.

About two years ago, owing to the warlike attitude of the Navajo and Ute Indians, it was deemed prudent for the inhabitants of Grafton, Shunesburgh and Springsdale to concentrate at this place; but now that peace seems to be restored for a season, the brethren are anxious to return to their former homes, and some are now moving in that direction. We read of our neighbors in the north enjoying the enlivening recreation of sleighing, and other healthful pastimes, peculiar to a northern climate, and to avoid feeling envious, we comfort ourselves with the reflection that if we are deprived of the pleasures of the north, neither are our ears made to tingle by the keen, biting blasts of winter that sometimes prove fatal to man and beast. It is sorrowful indeed to read of our fellow-creatures falling a prey to the merciless storm and perishing in the snow.

The natives immediately surrounding us are disposed to be friendly, and assist in many of the labors that have to be performed, such as digging water-ditches, cutting fire-wood, carrying water, &c.

Very respectfully, your brother in the gospel.

CHARLES N. SMITH.
