The Early Rose and the Extra

Early Vermont we tried side by is the earliest.

The Extra Early Vermont was recommended to us as being ten days earlier than the Early Rose, therefore we had to experiment to satisfy ourselves.

We planted a number of sets of the twe kinds last named on the first day of June, 1874, and as soon as the vines showed any sign of tubers we took much pains to grabble the hills often, to compare the progress of both kinds, and invariably found the Extra Early Vermont in advance of the Early Rose; therfore concluded the same as the editor of the American Agriculturist, that the former petatoe is easily ten days in advance of the latter.

On the first of September the Extra Early Vermont was telerably well ripened, the skins adhering firmly to the tuber, and only having been planted exactly three calender months.

We have tried the quality of the Extra Early Verment by cooking

Extra Early Verment by cooking a number, and say that the flavor is very rich and pleasant to the taste, being a very fine, floury, white potato, and fully as good as either the Early Rose or the Neshannoc. The Early Rose is about fifteen days earlier than the Neshannoc, and the Extra Early Vermont is about twenty-five days.

We will give the two kinds another fair trial next summer, all being well, and if the results prove as satisfactory as they have done this, the Early Rose will not be cultivated by us as the earliest potato any more.
