

LIGHTS AND SHADOWS OF A CITY AS SEEN BY A SALT LAKE WOMAN

FALLING leaf and fading tree," mark with gold, a baulked and secluded spot in the cemetery, where two lone mounds, a little one and a big one, contain the tragic story of a wife and its father.

Reposing beneath their eaves of leaf gold and the autumn sunshine, who thinks of these graves, shrunken and known, unmarked? Who knows they are there at all, so level are they, almost with the ground? Long ago, now, was "Goodbye, summer; Goodbye, summer, ere the late and known the spring."

A man in the rough, with a heart of gold, married a young girl of the world—a butterfly. A creature full of brilliant plumage who had nothing to do with the rough life of the world and the sagebrush! She died, and the flowers out of too proper enchantment, she did the very best she could perhaps. All who knew, condemned her, of course. But there was much to be taken into consideration. A child petted and pampered, spoiled and indulged, with her mentality running to the land of song and sun, the home of waste, and such a lack of tact, of chivalry, of courtesy, of she was more to be pitied than blamed, surely.

Attracted for a time toward this big rough fellow of the golden west, so much talked about in her narrow little sphere in the east, and no doubt impressed with the notion of the small importance and courage attaching to the name of the man, she, in his little power of the hothouse, consented to being transplanted.

It was a sad mistake! The new life was vigorous, wholesome, but very rough. The hardy, growing flower of the cactus blossoms, in the burning sun, has this blossoming in the brawling sun, and infesting for moist soil and gentle showers.

The boy was but a few months old, when returning from work one evening the young father found it walking in its little crib alone, when the birth of his second child, when the husband's health failed him.

Their poverty was bitter, and in the

No walkings were in the sunny air To flutter them away."

Once in a while a letter comes across the water to our town, and it concerns a tiny grave on sunny slope, where the autumn breezes carry the yellow poplar leaves, letting them fall upon it like golden moth of refection against the winter blasts.

It is a sad story. A young couple came from the sea from Italy to establish a little home and business in Salt Lake. All went well and happily until after the birth of their second child, when the husband's health failed him.

Their poverty was bitter, and in the midst of it, the baby died. It was next decided that the boy and only chance of survival, his mother's life, must take him back to his native land, Italy. Through the kindness and generosity of friends the way was made clear, and leaving the little fresh grave on the hillside, the journey, sad and painful, was begun. At its end, death claimed its second victim out of that unfortunate little family.

Born of good family and well educated, the young lad, leaving home with an aged mother, went to a villa on the Mediterranean to act in the capacity of governess in a nobleman's household.

This all happened many years ago. The one remaining child is now a young man grown, and the mother has passed, but the tiny grave on the side hill has never been forgotten. Every year, before Decoration time, the letter comes with the request that flowers be placed upon the little mound.

It was a short and easy road to the grave, alongside the little one. He struggled there, against it, he showed strength there, but it was too much, the loneliness, the sorrow, the loneliness. The leaf fell, the tree faded, both too soon, but—

"Leaves have their times to fall. And flowers to wither at the north wind's breath. And stars to set—but all. Their last all seasons for thine own, O death."

The yellow poplar leaves come down And like a carpet lay:

They had not kindly passed him by in account of them, there had been more to a one stormy scene in that early neglected home of late. But division! The thought had never occurred to him, on account of their little one.

It was a fatal blow. It would have broken a stronger man. It stunned this man to drinking. But not until after the death of his child, a few months later for then, it was "goodbye, perhaps. All who knew, condemned her, of course. But there was much to be taken into consideration. A child petted and pampered, spoiled and indulged, with her mentality running to the land of song and sun, the home of waste, and such a lack of tact, of chivalry, of courtesy, of she was more to be pitied than blamed, surely.

Attracted for a time toward this big rough fellow of the golden west, so much talked about in her narrow little sphere in the east, and no doubt impressed with the notion of the small importance and courage attaching to the name of the man, she, in his little power of the hothouse, consented to being transplanted.

did this time of the year, and with me it is always the melancholy days have come the saddest of the year."

He was silent for a few minutes, and then, at last, he and his confessor seated themselves in the midst of a glory of yellow leaves he said again.

"I must talk today," said his friend kindly. "I must tell you what it is." "I killed her," the man said, nodding in the direction of a grave.

"Go on; tell me about it. I will do you good to tell it," kindly again, for the poor man's courage seemed to fail him.

"Mary and I were very happily married and were blessed with two beautiful children. But we were poor, and I couldn't stand prosperity, and gambling took possession of me. I lost my hold, and my business, and my home. I lost more than this—I lost Mary. She died of a broken heart. And my children—"

"Where is your girl?" asked the minister.

The man evaded him. "My boy is running a race up north."

"And your girl?" "Can you not help me to reclaim my boy? I make an honest living now, and would gladly receive him with open arms."

"I will see what can be done; I will help you, all I can. But your girl—you do not tell me what has become of her."

"Worse than dead; and my God! I don't know where she is."

A Most Worthy Article.

When an article has been on the market for a while, and all the friends every year, it is safe to call this most worthy one. Such is Ballard's Honeymen Syrup. It positively cures coughs and all Pulmonary Diseases. One of the best known physicians in America says:

"For five years my family has not been troubled with the winter coughs; we attribute this to Ballard's Honeymen Syrup. I know it has saved my children from the sick spell. I am a subscriber to the Drug Dept., 112 and 114 South Main Street, B.
