President Darling, after reading the communication, stated it came upou-him like a thunderbolt from a clear sky. He had no intimation of dissatisfaction on the part of the faculty. The trouble grew almost wholly out of the recent discipline of the senior class. It seemed there was not a rebellion of the students against the faculty only, but a rebellion of the faculty against the president. He concluded by saying that he had been ready the day before to place his resignation at the disposal of the trustees. He could not do so now. It would not be just either to himself or the college. A special committee of trustees was appointed to take into consideration the communication of the faculty, and also the general state of the college discipline and government.
