THE PARISIAN BLACK AND WHITE COMBINATION.

At the Paris races many very striking costumes are seen, and this year more than half of the ultra smart effects are in black and white. A favorite combination is the lace coat of pure white and the black hat trimmed with jet and sweeping ostrich feathers. Such a combination is seen here, and it will be noted that every detail is decidedly French—the black jet earrings accentuating the black of the hat; the white gloves and parasol with white and black handle; even the little jet brooch on the white coat is a touch of French chic. This coat is of white Renaissance lace fitted to the figure by means of shaped panels.

THE HONEYMOON TRIP GOING OUT OF FASHION

THE honeymoon trip, said to be one of the oldest existing customs, is rapidly going out of fashion. This unexpected information comes from the class of people who, above all others, would be certain to know, namely, hotel managers. With deepest regret, the heads of the big hosteleries say that more and more bride couples are going straight home after the ceremony.

Those who did take the time-honored "honeymoon trip" made it shorter last year than ever before, and this year they are only taking a day or two. In a few years it seems probable that the custom will have become entirely obsolete.

The reason seems to be in the fact that the trip is no longer necessary, and that honeymoons are really critical times for the nerves, which are less likely to prove unhappy in the quiet of the home than in travel and hotels.

Those who pry into the prehistoric past of the human race say that the honeymoon journey came about the most things, from necessity. When a young man wanted a wife in the wild, uncivilized days of the hunting and fishing stage he had to get her by force, unless by chance he happened to be wealthy in such worldly goods as there were in those days.

But few young men were wealthy enough then to buy their wives, as was lawful and proper. There was another and more popular, though strenuous, method. It involved the aid of a man friend, who was the "best man." He was indeed the best man, for on his bravery and cunning depended the whole success of the undertaking.

If the would-be bridegroom owned or other men folk, who were certain to arise from their slumber and fight. In the middle of the night the groom and his best man broke into the home of the bride-to-be, who, more than likely, had small suspicion of serious intentions. Then would follow blows, shrieks and confusion. If the goddess of love proved favorable, the groom would emerge bearing the insensible form of his beloved.

Under cover of the "best man's" valiant fighting, the groom must jump upon a horse with his precious burden and escape.

Thus the "honeymoon trip" began, and it lasted just as long as the angry father kept up the "parade." Now, that it is no longer good form to propose with the smooth side of a club and the only violence attending a wedding is the hurrying of old shoes, the whole system has become unnecessary.

The first few weeks of married life decide whether the new career shall start right or wrong, and nothing unfavorable to success should enter into the environment. The manager of a famous New York hotel remarked as follows on his experience of honeymoons:

"Brides and bridegrooms are not always the ecstatically happy people they are supposed to be, and tears on a honeymoon are not by any means unknown," he said. "I used to manage a hotel in Boston, and any number of honeymoons came there. The wedding day is an awful strain, and often upsets tempers for days. The young people would arrive at the hotel just in time for dinner after a journey of six hours, and often more. The bride would be looking pale and tired, he harassed and worried to see her so and making a great fuss generally. Then would follow a hurried unpacking and frantic preparations for dinner. He would do her dress up all wrong, and while the chambermaid was rectifying matters would discover that his dinner coat had been left behind or that he had no dress shoes. Then the first meal together would be a dismal failure."

"Which are the dangerous rocks in the early days of marriage? I think that keeping her husband waiting is
