The attitude of most people in Christendom is evidence that the forms they follow and the creeds they confess are man-made and they consider them so. A religion that is framed by mortals only, no master how much of truth it may embody, is simply the result of human effort and may be variously estimated. But a religion revealed from God as His handiwork, sent down from heaven for man's obed:ence and guidance, must or necessity be viewed in a-different light by those who accept it as such. It is enough now to put down a public man, in the world's estimation, to say, "he is a Mormon," that "whether startlog a newspaper, or building a palace or fighting a hopeless cause in Paritament (or Congress or elsewhere) he never forgets to defend his Church," or that "he subordinates everything to acute theological and ecclesiastical interests." In Apostolic times this was a Christian virtue, an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual Christian grace.
