

(From Tinsley's Magazine.)

MY FIRST DINNER PARTY.

"Mabel," said my aunt to me, as I sat at my work in the bay window, ever and anon letting it drop idly in my lap to gaze out at the beautiful carriages and gaily dressed people that passed to and fro beneath my eyes—"Mabel, my child is really too bad to allow of my going to Mrs. Dalton's to-night, so I have written her a note to say you will take my place, in case she should not know of any other substitute. It would never do to have an empty chair at a dinner party, and it would be but a poor compliment to ask any one else to take the same day."

"But, aunt, I have no fit dress to wear; and, besides, I shouldn't know how to behave. I have never been at a dinner party in my life."

"All the more reason you should not let slip so unusual a chance," said my aunt authoritatively. "It is one of the privileges of your visit to me that you get a glimpse at least of society."

My aunt thought a great deal of society, and of her place in it, and I believe, considered that the dreary months I spent with her at Brimston were quite repaid by the advantages to be derived from her reflected glory. As, however, I left a cheerful home in the country and young brothers and sisters for the grand but unhome-like establishments of my formidable aunt at Brimston, I am afraid I did not look upon my advantages in the right light.

But I was a poor clergyman's daughter, and consequently, it is hardly necessary to add, one of a numerous family. I belong to the eldest of the thirteen. From this reason, I suppose, I had always been the one selected to go and stay with aunt Neville, whenever a peremptory summons had come to my mother (her niece) to send one of the children to her. We all—mother included—stood in some awe of Aunt Neville. She had such a commanding presence, dressed so handsomely, and moved in such high circles—compared, that is, to our very limited one. She was apt to be somewhat imperious, too, when thwarted, though most kind and genial in a general way. No wonder, with her warm heart and open-handed hospitality, she was a universal favorite. Her very peculiarities, her not particular ship, her strong prejudices and hearty likes and dislikes, all added, I think, to her popularity.

As for myself, I both loved and feared her, but could not throw off the feeling of restraint and shyness which continually harassed me in her company, especially when any of her numerous relatives were present. I was not "come-out," being barely seventeen, and was therefore treated as a child on all occasions of ceremony, never appearing at my aunt's table when she had friends with her, and usually leaving the carriage when I went with her to her calls. Thus it was no wonder that this sudden idea of going alone to a dinner party nearly took away my breath. But my aunt was not to be withstood when she spoke in that authoritative tone. The most I could do was to repeat my first objection, namely, the want of a dress.

"Nonsense, child!" said my aunt. "Summers shall see to that." A man in frock coat and top hat, and I will tell you my necklace and chaplet of pearls. But mind you are ready punctually at eight o'clock, or I shall order a cab for you; it is not worth while to take the horses out for so short a distance."

"Where does Mrs. Dalton live?" I asked.

"Let me see," replied my aunt; "the address must be on her note. She is an old friend of mine, but has only lately come to Brimston, so that I have not found her out yet. Ah! here it is, in good time comes her reply. I will let you keep the address."

So saying she glanced over the note given her, and handed it to me. I grasped it eagerly, as a criminal might a queen's pardon. Surely it would contain a release. But no, it ran as follows:

"My dear Mrs. Neville: Though deeply grieved to lose so valuable an addition to our party as yourself, we shall be very pleased to see your young niece, and only wish you could both come to us. We shall be almost entirely a family gathering, therefore she need not fear a formal dinner party. I submit my address, as there are other Daltons living also in Cumberland street, who do not belong at all to us. Bid your niece therefore be punctually at the number. Yours sincerely,

EMILY DALTON

The note was so kind and friendly that I felt somewhat relieved, and listened attentively to a long story my aunt had to tell me about her friends.

"Mrs. Dalton is a sweet woman, who has been married twice. Her first husband is dead, and her eldest son—a fine handsome fellow—had a sunstroke when he was with his regiment in India, and has never been the same since. I don't mean that he is mad, but at times he is very peculiar, and has to be humored in his queer fancies. He will probably die with you, so I tell you this that you may not appear surprised at anything he may say or do."

"Dear me! here was another and a quite unexpected cause of fear. Not fear of any harm to myself, but a great dread lest I should not acquit myself properly under these trying circumstances. A first dinner party in itself was bad enough, but going all alone, and to a house where one must be continually on the watch not to offend by word or look the peculiarities of a sensitive mother, was overwhelming. However, there was no help for it, my aunt's anger being still more to be dreaded than even this trial.

By a quarter to seven precisely, I came into my aunt's apartment for approval and last directions.
