FRAGMENTS.

CONFERENCE will be held next week.

J. M. TANNER, ESQ., is up from Provo.

THE Territorial Supreme Court will meet on Monday.

THE Conference people are already crowding into the city.

THE strong south wind enveloped the city in dust today.

THE Home Dramatic Club hold the boards at the Theatre for next week.

MARCH came in amid blustering weather, and goes out in a dust storm.

E. A. STRATFORD, ESQ., business manager of the Utah Journal, Logan, is in town.

E. S. Hyde, Esq., of the Ogden Standard's staff, came down today to see the tragedians.

THERE are two cases of scarlet fever in the family of Mr. F. M. Dodge, No. 221 S., First West Street.

DAN BUCK was taken in custody last night by the police, for interfering with them in making an arrest.

THE ushers in the Theatre did their work well last evening, and seated the immense audience in excellent order.

A CASE of scariatina is quarantined at Mr. Arthur Lowe's, Second South Street, between Fourth and Fifth East.

THE suit of Buckle vs. the South Helena Mining Company was being tried in the Third District Court today.

THE funeral of John F. Stevens will take place tomorrow at the residence of Mrs. S. L. Brown, 576 S. Second East Street, at 2 p. m. Friends are invited.

LOUIS CADWELL was arrested by the police last night on the charges of drunkenness and vagrancy. His trial was set for Monday at 2 p. m., bail being fixed at $50.

THE Young Brothers Company are getting ready for their fine exhibition of "Domestic" needlework, which will be given during Conference week, at No. 38 Main Street.

THE Utah Central is now selling tickets at the reduced rate to those desirous of attending conference. The tickets are good on the line south of Juab on Monday the 2nd, and from all other points on the 3d.

A VISIT to the piano depot of Taggart & Chamberlain, on Third South Street, and an inspection of the elegant instruments there to be seen, is sufficient to satisfy any one that the proprietors mean business and are likely to succeed.

A PECULIAR accident occurred near Chimney Rock, Nebraska, on March 28th. A two-year old child fell into a fourteen-inch well to the depth of 60 feet. To recover the body a small boy was lowered, head first, by a rope tied to his feet, and, clutching the garments of the dead child, was raised to the surface.

BY reference to the advertisement of the Vine Bluffs Works, of Nephi, Juab County, which appears in the Semi-Weekly, it will be seen that the proprietor is prepared to furnish Plaster of Paris—the best in the world—for ornamental or concrete work, or for use on land in any quantity and at reasonable rates. This is a home industry that deserves encouragement.

Jury Disagreed.

The jury in the suit of Francis R. Anderson vs. Samuel C. Ewing came into the Third District Court this morning, having been wrestling all night with the question submitted to them. The claim of the plaintiff is for $250, which she had paid to the defendant for a horse, and which was not as represented; she had subsequently sold the animal for $75. It was stated that on the question on which the jury failed to agree they were evenly divided. All were in favor of finding a verdict against Mr. Ewing, but six wanted to give Mrs. Anderson the full amount while the others voted for a slight reduction, and neither party would surrender.

THE FULL TERM.

Wm. R. Smith Sent to the Penitentiary.

This afternoon William R. Smith, President of the Davis County Stake, was called to receive sentence on a plea of guilty to unlawful cohabitation. Judge McBride, in behalf of the defendant, asked the court to postpone sentence for three weeks, to permit Mr. Smith to attend to some personal business.

Mr. Peters objected to the postponement, and Judge Zane refused to grant the request.

The Court then said—Mr. Smith, what have you to say? Do you intend to obey the law in the future?

Judge McBride said he had a statement written by the defendant, which he desired the Court to listen to. The paper was then read:

May it please your honor: I desire to make a statement. I have lived nearly sixty-two years, and for the first time I am now arraigned before a court of justice, having been charged with breaking the laws of my country. I will here state that I married three of my wives between thirty and forty years ago. I married my last wife some twenty years since, and for the last three or four years she had been an invalid, a great portion of the time confined to her room and much of the time to her bed. The condition and cirumstances with which she is now surrounded are likely to hasten her to an untimely grave. When we entered the marriage contract, to our understanding there was no law against it. They are the mothers of my children and the grandmothers of my grand-children. Our children are our seals to the agreement and our grandchildren are duplicate seals to the same, and consequently parties in interest. If sexual intercourse of itself constituted the offense with which I am charged, covered by the time of the indictment, I could not admit that I am guilty. I can state that I have not counseled or advised, in public or private, any one to break the laws of the land. I hold that all men are equally responsible before the law. And while I have no desire, in the least degree, to put myself in a defiant position to the laws of my country, unless I could still every sense of honor and manhood, and blot out every feeling of humanity from my soul, I could not repudiate the contracts before mentioned, without the free consent and desire of all parties in interest; and it is my desire, so far as I may have the opportunity, to provide for the wants and necessities of those women who are the mothers of my children; whose gray hairs shows unmistakable evidence of their decline in life. If I could prove to your honor, and it would free me from punishment, that for the three years covered by the indictment I had not visited either of the houses of those women to inquire after the wants of their families and provide for their necessities, and had not assisted them in the hour of affliction and sore trial; that I had not given them any more recognition than though they were strangers, the verdict of my heart would be that I was entirely destitute of moral courage and that I was deserving of just condemnation. I would prefer to suffer punishment undeserved rather than escape under those circumstances, when it was justly deserving. Those women have their own homes and farms, and hold the title to them in their own right; and so far as peace and good order are concerned, they will compare favorably with the same number anywhere, and I am grateful to state that up to the present not one disgraceful act has or can be recorded against any one of my families. If it please your honor, I respectfully ask you to defer sentence until you have carefully considered all the facts and conditions in the above statements. Having full confidence in your intelligence and high sense of honor, equity and justice, I trust that you will use the discretion you possess and mete out to me the same measure that you would desire meted out to you if our conditions were reversed. Thanking you for your indulgence and patience, I have no more to say.

Court (to defendant)—How many wives have you?

Mr. Smith—I have four.

Court—You have a lawful wife?

Mr. Smith—Yes, sir.

Court—What is the reason you cannot promise to live with her alone in the future?

Mr. Smith—My reasons are given in my statement.

The Court then read President Smith a lecture on the enormity of the offense of having more wives than one, and said: "The court would not be impartial to sentence poor and ignorant men to the penitentiary, for the full term, and be lenient to you, a President of a Stake, and a man of influence in the Church." He then sentenced Mr. Smith to six months and to pay a fine of $300 and costs.

After a pause, Judge Zane said—I wish here to remark that in some of these cases, gentlemen, presuming on their personal friendship with me, have approached me, to influence my judgment in these cases. I wish to say that I do not want any more of such proceedings. This does not apply to Judge McBride, who has represented the defendant here.

He Wanted to Die.

The latest individual up to date who has contemplated suicide is Fred. K. Hollingren, who has figured in the Police Court on more than one occasion because of quarrels with his wife. The couple have not dwelt happily together for some time, and recently separated. Mrs. H. took with her their three children, two boys and a girl and has been living on First South Street, but the rent having been raised, she sold out her household furniture, preparatory to leaving.

When the sale was finished she wrapped up a small parcel of clothing, gave it to the two boys—eight and seven, respectively—and saying that she had provided for them as long as she was able to, told them to hunt their father up and let him furnish them a home. They started out yesterday morning, and after searching around for a while found their father. He, however, deserted them and went into a saloon. The little fellows wandered about till late in the afternoon, having been without food all day, when they found their way to the City Hall.

When he left them, their father had given them a note to take to their mother, but in going back to their former home they found that she and the little girl had departed. The note is in Swedish, and reads as follows:

"Old woman, you understand what sorrow you have brought on me. Are you silly? Why don't you send your children to an orphan's home? There is no hope; you will never see me any more in this life. I am going to disappear in the spirit world. Farewell, Augusta. You have ruined me forever. You have no conscience. Oh! I have no life.

Yours forever, KARL."

The police hunted Holingren up, and took him to task for his course. He declared that his life had become so miserable with his spouse that he wanted to die, and contemplated self-destruction. He changed his mind, however, and started off with the boys to place them in the Orphan's Home.

After Holingren had gone, Mrs. H. came to the Hall and inquired for the boys, her conscience having smitten her at having turned them out. She pleaded that she was unable to provide for them and that their father failed to do so. When told where they had been taken to she departed, apparently better satisfied.

Sunday School Union.

BOOTH-BARRETT.

The Great Engagement Begins.—America's Two Foremost Actors as Iago and Othello.

An interior jammed and black with people. "Standing room only" on sale, and that rapidly diminishing as the surging tide of humanity swept into the building and, flooding pit, circles, galleries, eagerly settled itself in every available nook and corner of the spacious auditorium. A ticket-seller worn and weary, though still active and agitated; a management proud and happy; an audience breathless with expectancy, already seated, or pushing anxiously towards the much coveted chairs which had cost so much time and money to secure; the subdued strains of an invisible orchestra occupying the stage back of scene and curtain, for the first time in its history to allow three rows of extra chairs, filled with as many spectators, to have its place within the railing, and a curtain waiting to ring up on the most notable event in local histrionic annals. Such in brief was the spectacle presented by the Salt Lake Theatre last evening.

Promptly at fifteen minutes past eight the curtain rose upon the play, Shakespeare's great tragedy, Othello. A prolonged aspirate, "Sh," like the whispering of autumn winds through withered leaves, swept over the audience, and every neck was craned and every eye and ear concentred upon the stage.

The characters first to appear are Iago and Roderigo, on their midnight errand to the home of Senator Brabantio, to acquaint him with the horrifying news that his daughter, Desdemona, and the Moor, are "no more twain but one flesh." Mr. Booth was at first unrecognized, save by a few, as he glided gracefully towards the footlights, or without doubt he would have received quite as stormy a welcome as that which greeted his distinguished compeer, a few moments later. From the first it was evident that Booth was playing to win; every nerve was strained and every point made to tell. Never before was such an Iago seen upon our boards; we do not even except the fine impersonation given here by the great tragedian some months ago, which, compared to last night's thoroughly admirable rendering, was tame and feeble. The reason is, doubtless, that, in a competitive sense, he had "a foeman worthy of his steel," in other words, he was playing against Barrett's Othello, and could not afford to lose a single trick. The result was a triumph for the actor and a feast for his audience.

Barrett played with his usual excellence, without exhibiting to the fullest extent the magnetic power of which we all know him capable. It was not such an Othello as a Forrest or a Salvini would have given; it lacked the robust savagery of the latter, the tempestuous fury of the former; but it was a strong and admirable delineation nevertheless, and in places the actor came near to shining with the full lustre of his genius. The great scene in Act Third, where the cunning human devil, Iago, incites the Moor to jealousy, gave each actor his best opportunity, and right royally was it taken advantage of. The curtain was rung up twice at the close of this act, in response to the most tremendous peals of applause. Aside from this crowning gem, among the scintillations of genius which flew like sparks from a forge throughout the entire evening, may be noted the following: Othello's apology before the senate, his tender show of grief at dismissing Cassio, his love for his wife struggling with his jealous rage, his heart-breaking farewells to the sleeping Desdemona before murdering her, and his stunned sense of stupefaction as he gradually awakens to the horrible realization of how he has been duped and ruined by that arch hypocrite and fiend of politicans, Iago. The latter was so evenly excellent a portraval as to defy criticism, and almost baffle an attempt at particularization; the smirking malignity, the satanic philosophy, the hypocritical humility and false show of candor and friendship were never so strikingly and consummately portrayed; wringing applause for the expression of the most villainous sentiments from hands whose owners' hearts are filled with loathing and execration, is certainly one of the triumphs of the actor's art. The fiendish malignity and gloating exultation which Booth threw into his countenance—one of the most expressive that nature ever made—as he bent over the prostrate form of the suicide, Othello, in the finale of the tragedy, though he spoke not a word, told the whole story of his villainous life and the motives which had actuated him.

The support was evenly good, the exception being Miss Mina K. Gale, whose Desdemona was of more than ordinary excellence, intense as well as beautiful. Our townsman, Mr. Royle, cast for Paulo, did not appear last evening, having been excused to spend the evening, his only chance this time, with the "old folks at home." He will play tonight.

An innovation worthy of all praise was inaugurated by the ladies in the audience, most of whom came without hats, with hair neatly dressed, and opera hoods for outside wear. The effect was wonderfully pleasing. It is true people go to the Theatre to see all that is to be seen, and while a pretty face under a fashionable hat is often a cynosure of interest and admiration, there is a popular impression that the players on the stage should be seen as well, and the back of a lady's head, however handsome, scarcely repays for the supreme effort necessary on the part of the straining occupant of a seat in the rear to convert the top of a banner into "Burnham wood coming to Dunsinane," or a solitary plume waving dreamily in the distance into the gorgeous parade of "the Emperor's body guard" prior to the "descent of the anarchists and destruction of the imperial palace." Let "hats off" be the rule, ladies, from henceforth, and make your admirers correspondingly happy.

"Hamlet" Booth's inimitable impersonation, with Barretts' fiery Laertes, is being witnessed this afternoon by another mammoth audience, but the grand crush will take place tonight at the great performance of Julius Cæsar.

"Household" Exhibition.

On Monday next the Burton-Gardner Company will give an exhibition at their salesrooms, opposite east of the Theatre, free to Conference visitors. It will consist of a large display of fancy needlework done on the "Household" sewing machine. Every lady who visits the store from April 2nd to 10th will receive a number in the drawing for a new $75 "Household" machine which is to be given away.

Bessemer's steel patents have brought him $35,385,000 in royalties.

HOME MANUFACTURE.

SALT LAKE CITY, March 30th, 1888.

Editor Deseret News:

"That settles it," says the reader, on picking up the paper, "that subject is worn so completely threadbare that, with your permission, I'll skip."

Hold on a moment. Don't be in such a rush. I'll not detain you.

Reader. "Oh, I know all you have to say, but I've tried it, and it won't work."

Why not?

R. "Nobody encourages it, except on paper. Our merchants won't sell home-made goods and the people won't buy them. I tell you I've been through the mill. We can't begin to compete with the cheap labor and labor-saving machinery and large capital of the east. It's utterly preposterous to think of it. Ta-ta; see you later."

Why, what's your hurry?

R. "Well, the fact is, I've got a lot of hides and wool that I'm anxious to ship east, and I've got to rustle."

See here, you're getting off on the wrong foot.

R. "How so?"

Well, you shouldn't ship them east.

R. "Why not?"

Simply because they are needed at home.

R. "Nonsense! I know all the old arguments you would introduce, but it won't work. Home manufacture is a flat failure and you know it as well as I do."

Excuse me, I don't know it, but, on the contrary, I do know that it is a decided success, when properly conducted.

R. "Give me a single instance of it?"

Well, among many others, there is the shoe factory of Z. C. M. I. I don't think that any one can consistently say, in face of the facts, that that institution is not a success, and a very pronounced one. If there was any business in the world that looked more hopeless than that in its incipiency, when Mr. W. H. Rowe took hold, it would be difficult to point it out. The merchants did not like the appearance of the first products, and the profits on them were not so large as on imports. The railroads preferred to ship eastern shoes here. The shoeshops of Lynn, Massachusetts, had much capital invested, a vast amount of labor-saving machinery, and the advantage of cheap labor, yet in the face of all these discouraging circumstance, the company persisted in making shoes, and continued to make them, until they came out on top. They achieved a decided victory over the trained labor, machinery and capital of the east and the big building adjoining Z. C. M. I. is the monument of their success. Now all I wish to say is, what has been done can be done. If Z. C. M. I., with proper management can virtually beat the world in making shoes, other organizations with like ability and with like persistence, can successfully compete im making home made clothing, or in making leather, or a hundred other things, the material of which we pay for shipping east, pay for manufacturing there, pay for shipping back again, and then pay heavy profits on. People here should not be discouraged because large capital is invested in manufactures in the east. Capital is proverbially timid and money is not invested where profits are not expected. What we need is a few more monuments erected here like that adjoining Z. C. M. I. Who will build them?
