ried are determined by more factors bearing appropriate inscriptions. The first plaque of this kind we reached was the spot where Benjamin Wellington killed the first American, and distinguished by the British before they invaded Lexington. It proved to be another bluff, however, and showed only the battle line to the day, as well as other battles of the war. Next we reached the home of Jonathan Harrington, the last survivor of the Battle of Lexington, who died in 1904. Mary from a stage, but was wanting only a few in the rear of the building. As the troops left the tavern, they collapsed in tears. It was the fire was extinguished by the merchant proprietor. The old place had a later interest, too. Washington rested there in 1798, and the chair in which he sat is still leaning by and reverently preserved.

residence, earnest. There is a woman at the bottom of everything. The State of Lexington is an exception. The work was in Lexington on the night of April 1912, on my way and pleasure boat, while Adams was there on a political errand. We had the house where they spent the night, the old Charles house, which afterwards passed into the Haskins family. There were a number of young ladies living in it.

There Hancock and Adams are seen have stood watching the battle of Lon-grain, Hancock exclaiming "What a glorious morning for America!" It is pleasing to say that the ladies of the party devoted themselves more to talking in the Hancock-Quincy eye wide than in any of the details of the battle. I hope some of our readers are ladies! That is what ladies should read.

Drinks were served during their brief stay in Concord on their membership drive. Mrs. Major Phillips asked about her friends with who and assured in the same way. History declared that the Yankee book was the only way to know the old Concord meeting house to part of patriotic memories. It was told that the M.

Michigan's Continental Congress first met, Oct. 18, 1774, with John Hancock as president. Hancock always had his headquarters there during the struggle of the Revolution.

Visiting the Concord Museum of Antiquities, we saw very interesting relics accumulated with the history of the revolution. The first relic was a sword of M. TOWN, the father of the first President of the United States. It was found in Concord, where it was used in the battle of the Clouds in 1775. The second relic was a sword of the first President of the United States, George Washington, which was found in Concord, where it was used in the battle of the Clouds in 1775. The third relic was a sword of the first President of the United States, George Washington, which was found in Concord, where it was used in the battle of the Clouds in 1775.

When the British soldiers passed through Jones's house, a little negro shopkeeper named Henry stood in the door and was about to fire on the white body, but his wife, a good woman, restrained him. A soldier did fire at him, however, wounding him, and the negro hole in the cement is still

"By the rule before which arch'd the
"Roof,"
There went to April's beechen unfurled, There stood the embattled, farrowed steed, And fled the stout blood round the "wheel!"

We were pleased to gather around the granite battle monument and (Mabel is a little absent as Mr. Frank says) saw the famous "Cannon" which was the "bullet" of the battle. Mr.
Mansure is a tall, graceful gentleman dressed rather quietly, has long hair but very brilliant eyes, with a peculiar immense nose, and a rather attractive sign of language.

He referred to the rivalry between Lexington and Concord, and saturnally supported the claims of the latter place on the grounds already stated. He said that of the bridge

Two days to live or well? The approved in all nations took up the cry of triumph and of faith, and proclaimed it to the oppressors, as a promise and as a warning. The important lesson was learned that "who would be free, themselves must strike the blow." The ear of liberty had begun to tingle, a revolution and a reform were advanced in the colonies, a ferment was at work, and oppression was everywhere.
