"I always knock my men out with as much gentleness as possible," says Mr. Fitzsimmons, "and it doesn't burt in the least to be properly knocked out-just like the pleasant sensation of falling asleep after a hard day's work." It is certainly gratifying to find this humanitarian doctrine, this devotion to art for art's sake, in so unexpected a quarter. But why not? Why shouldn' one artist of the squared circle break the nose of a brother artist in a cour-teous and helpful manner, instead of be-ing rugh about it? What is the use of hurting a man, just because you can, when it becomes the part of professional duty to smash him in the stomach with sufficient firmness to render him unable to draw his breath again until after the lapse of the statutory ten seconds? This expression from Mr. Fitzsimmons is not only highly creditable to him as a gente-man of taste and sensibility but is very valuable coming as it does right at the height of the football discussion. In its application to pugilism the prin-ciple is limited to the use of the gloved ist upon the upper half of the body of one man; the employment of feet, knees, shoulders, thumbs, elbows and teeth does plied to football the possibilities are almost limitless.
