A RED-LETTER WEEK.

Well, it wasn't a green Christmas, after all. Neither was it blue, so far as the great majority were concerned. It was quite as bright and as generous all round as any of the precedents have been, and it was perhaps more commendable than most of them by reason of the great fact that it called forth a splendid showing of unselfishness, wherein every participant was able to give a thought to others besides himself and his. The poor were not forgotten, and in the way of Christmas comforts there was probably not a family in the city that did not see at least one of its members something that caused a ray of sunlight to enter their door. The streets were a blinding sea of light all day, and for some days previously the evidences were all so strongly against them that their mouths could hardly open to breathe the plains of their hearts have almost come to take delight in talking.

In town, last week showed very little of the gleaming splendor of hard times. Everybody seemed to have money, and everybody else seemed to be able to get a little of it. Most of the merchants did an unexpected amount of business, the streets and the stores were crowded with customers all the time, and almost all out before Saturday night, and the markets and provision dealers were hardly able to hand over their good things fast enough to suit the throng of buyers. We venture to say that there is no city in America where in proportion to population there was anything like the amount of business done last Saturday that was transacted right here in Salt Lake City. The News mentions the fact with pleasure, because it proves what we have all along estimated for, namely, that this city and Territory are all right, and that, such a thing as widespread poverty or destitution—such as other communities are afflicted with—here does not exist; and that if there are occasional instances of real suffering there are also willing hands to render aid. Trade is certainly looking up, and prospects are brightening within our own borders and all around us. With a week of such activity as that which has just passed, people ought to be able to look forward without reservation or hesitancy to a happy and prosperous New Year.

PREHISTORIC TOWNS.

The remains of five prehistoric towns have been discovered from twenty to forty miles below Eldorado, New Mexico. The discovery was made on Wednesday, the 20th, last, by Messrs. M. M. Miller, of St. Louis, and E. B. Brown, of St. Paul. These gentlemen are regarded as authorities on prehistoric Indian ruins. They state that the towns were built on a plateau about 15,000 to 20,000 feet above the sea level, and were built by the same people who built the ancient cities of the Southwest. They also state that the ruins were built by the same people who built the ancient cities of the Southwest.

A VOID ELECTION.

The supreme court of California has handed down a decision that renders upon a point of interest to voters in selecting a candidate for office. By the ruling of the court it is declared that the office of the chief of police of Sacramento is vacant, and that the incumbent, John H. Rogers, is not eligible for re-election. The court's decision is based on the fact that Rogers is not a resident of the city of Sacramento, and therefore is not eligible for the office.
