CONTESTED ELECTION

TERRITORY OF UTAH.

Geo. R. Maxwell vs. Geo. Q. Cannon.

Argument of Halbert E. Paine, Counsel for Sitting Member.

(Before the Committee on Elections of the House of Representatives of the United States, Washington, D. C., 1874.)

"The case I allude to was that of Mr. Walpole, who was afterwards first minister to King George I and King George II, for the term of twenty years and upwards. On the 17th of January, 1711—'12, he was voted by the House of Commons guilty of a high breach of trust and notorious corruption, in receiving the sum of five hundred guineas, and taking a note for five hundred pounds more, on account of two contracts made by him when secretary of war, pursuant to a power granted by the Lord Treasurer, and for this offense he was committed prisoner to the Tower, and expelled the House. He was immediately re-elected, but declared incapable of being chosen during that Parliament. However, on the dissolution of it, a year and a half afterwards, he was again chosen into the new Parliament, was admitted to take his seat without the least question or objection on account of his former expulsion, and continued a member of the House of Commons, in every subsequent Parliament, till the year 1742, when he was created Earl of Orford. It cannot be denied that the offense was in its nature infamous, and such a one as rendered the person guilty of it unfit to be trusted with the power to give or to manage the public money. The same party that expelled him, whose enmity was aggravated by his great talents and knowledge of business, continued equally adverse to him, and equally prevalent in the new Parliament; but however desirous they were to get rid of him, and however violent upon many other occasions, yet in the very zenith of their power they did not dare to set up this pretence or to urge the expulsion of a former Parliament, although not two years before, as a sufficient ground for re-expelling or declaring him incapable of sitting in a new Parliament. If this could have been attempted, every circumstance concurred to make them wish it. The crime itself was breach of trust and notorious corruption in a public officer relative to public money—an offense in the eye of Parliament certainly not less infamous or less criminal than writing and publishing a seditious libel. Few, if any, were more obnoxious or more formidable to them than the gentleman who had been the object of their justice or resentment. The heat of party rage had been pleaded in excuse, if not in justification, of many extravagancies on both sides, but they thought this measure beyond the mark of a common violence, and therefore dared not to attempt it. I have said before that it was not my intention to approve or to blame the censure they passed upon that extraordinary man.

"It was the subject of great discussion and altercation at the time. I do not wish to revive past heats. The present are more than sufficient, and all wise and good men should endeavor, by justice and moderation, to allay them. Let us suppose that he was guilty or innocent of the charge to the utmost extent, and then let us consider how the case will apply to that part of the question which is now before us. The crime, as it related to a fraud concerning the public revenue, was certainly under the immediate cognisance of this House, and was, perhaps, punishable in no other manner. They punished it as severely as they could, both by imprisonment and expulsion, the former of which ended in a few months, and the consequence of the latter in a year and a half. If he was guilty of a high breach of trust and notorious corruption, he was certainly very unfit to be invested with the most sacred trust in this kingdom, that of a member of the Legislature. Had the question been asked upon that occasion likewise, what merit he had after his first expulsion to recommend him to the subsequent Parliament, the answer must have been, that he had persisted in justifying what he had done; that he had appealed not only to his electors but to the world at large, in more than one printed pamphlet, accusing the House of Commons, which had condemned him, of violence and injustice. With all these aggravations, and with every other inducement, what could have protected him—what could have prevented his re-expulsion but the notoriety and the certainty that such a measure was not consistent with the known law and usage of Parliament, even when exerted against a guilty and obnoxious man? This is the state of the argument upon that supposition. But if we take the other part of the alternative, and suppose that he was innocent of the charge, the proposition would be much stronger. We must, then, consider him in the light of a man expelled by party rage, or on worse motives, not for his crimes, but for his merit; not that he was unfit, but that he was too well qualified for the trust reposed in him. What would have been the consequence if this doctrine of transferring the disability incurred by a former sentence to a subsequent Parliament had been then established? The public and this House would have been deprived for ever of those services which, from his knowledge and talents, they had a right to expect, and which they so much relied upon, particularly in the important business of the finances of this kingdom; and that gentleman and his family would have been precluded, irreparably precluded, by an unjust judgment, from those great emoluments and high honors which were conferred upon him by two successive kings, as the rewards of his administration.

"That loss, however, would have been the misfortune of individuals; but a much heavier, a much more extensive misfortune would have befallen the Parliament and the constitution if so dangerous a precedent had taken place. An easy and an effectual plan would have been marked out to exclude from this House for ever, by an unjust vote once passed, any member of it who should be obnoxious to the rage of party or to the wantonness of power. Let not your prejudices, let not your just resentments against the conduct and character of the man who is now an object of your deliberation prevail upon you to ground any part of your proceedings upon such destructive and fatal principles. Consider what precedents of this nature are generally begun in the first instance against the odious and the guilty; but, when once established, how readily applied to and made use of against the meritorious and the innocent; that the most eminent and most deserving members of the state under the colour of such an example by one arbitrary and discretionary vote of the House of Parliament (the worst species of ostracism) may be exclud[ed] from the public councils, and proscribed from the rights of every subject of the realm, not for a term of years alone, but for ever."
