CORRESPONDENCE.

At the Centennial.

PHILADELPHIA, June 24, 1876.

Editor Deseret News:

There is not much in the Exposition to satisfy the universal morbid craving for important news. The gates open and close every day, and about 25,000 paying visitors of all ages, both sexes, and every condition of life come daily to see the growing wonder. All are doubtless benefited in some way by what they see, but of course, not equally. The tale unfolded is so various as the individuals to whom it is addressed, and its usefulness is in the ratio of its intelligibility, or the previous preparation of the visitor to see and comprehend.

Yesterday, I was in the shoe and leather annex, with a former sea-captain, who is now proprietor of a large tannery in Canada. I could not but admire the genuine enthusiasm for leather. "This is leather, sir," "This is nice," he repeated again and again, with an eloquence of voice, gesture, and eye, that more than supplemented his paucity of language, and seemed to remove the beautiful tanned skins far from the stench of the tannery to the plane of high art.

What prodigious information a man would have, how immensely would the area of his enjoyment (and alas! of his suffering too) be widened if he could see, in every trade, art and science as much as the tanner sees in leather.

This naive old man, who had been buffeted by every sea and whose keel had touched every continent, was offended at the paintings of the nude human figure in Memorial Hall. "It is a shame, sir; look, some of them have every thing; they will corrupt these young people who come here. I am surprised that the authorities will allow them to remain on the walls. But perhaps it is my want of refinement," he added, reflectively.

Early this week I attended the opening of the Pacific States building. A number of the States have built cottages, the object being to establish social centres, where the visitor may meet the citizens of his own State, form new acquaintances and renew old friendships. I do not think this end will be accomplished. The average visitor spends less than a minute (quite as much time as should be wasted) in writing his name in the registers in the different State buildings and lies to more interesting shows. These cottages with registers for names may, however, be useful in one respect—the American Vandal. It has been discovered, must write his name somewhere; he had begun to write it on the marble slabs in Memorial Hall. These State buildings, however, as a kind of sewage (pardon the metaphor) for his autographic flux.

The California or Pacific slope building is nearly finished and I suppose it cost about five thousand dollars. Its architecture is of a composite order, in which the mauresque and gothic predominate. On the occasion of the opening, we had music by the band, congratulatory patriotic and mutual laudation speeches by the Pacific states. The natural resources of the country, its big trees, rich mines, high mountains, and great men were duly advertised. The orators, it was plain, were speaking for the one or two hundred newspapers that are published beyond the Sierra Nevada mountains; one of them would decline a nomination to Congress or to the State legislature. The lesson taught by this display was that a California sophomoric, blatherskite and demagogue does not differ from the genius in the East.

Hon. James Campbell, of Pa., who reported the bill authorizing the construction of the Pacific Railroad, was called upon; he related the obstacles encountered in securing the passage of the bill during the progress of the war, and elicited rounds of applause when he showed how the country had been benefited by the road, what it had accomplished for the Exposition, and when he repeated the words of Lincoln that no official act of his life had given him more pleasure than the signing of the bill authorizing the construction of the road. Ex-Governor Curtin was the next speaker; he had not heard the preceding speeches, and was therefore in danger of repeating what had already been said; but, if any speaker had omitted to refer to the American flag he hoped it would be considered that it had been duly referred to; if any speaker had failed to mention that this was the greatest of all the International Expositions he hoped he might be allowed the credit of having originated the idea. He continued in this strain for some time, when he became serious and called forth much applause by the expression of his sentiment that the greatest good to be achieved by the Exposition was the demonstration and fertilization of all hearts and states for the progressive work of another century.
