

WATERFORD'S GHOST

A chance seems to suggest that something singular was going on night after night at the old house in Waterford's clearing. Lights had been burning about the place for hours at a stretch.

Yet during the day everything about looked as lonely as ever, and visitors, passing across and climbing up to the clearing, repeated no speech of human fact.

This last report gradually quietened public curiosity, and many eyes were now turned to the clearing every night. Not until the first week in November did there seem some general inclination to believe that something unusual continued to be seen, now fading out at different points, now falling and darting, to more firmly establish the legend of Waterford's ghost.

To find that this human legend caused quite a sensation in Waterford would naturally excite the world's interest. The place was now receiving many visitors, and the legend of Waterford's ghost was about to become a pretty well-known story.
