

ARCHITECT TALKS ON TEMPLE'S PLAN

Noted Chicago Authority High in His Praise of Famous Building's Design.

ESCAPED MANY TEMPTATIONS

Queen Anne Style Prevailed When It Was Built and Most of Its Examples Were Conspicuous Failures.

An arrangement of the Salt Lake temple's architecture, made in a method following Kipling, who said flippant things about the building long before it was completed, was published in the Architectural Record this summer, over the signature of Franz K. Winkler. Local papers, anxious to repeat anything complimentary to the builders of the temple, and the founders of the commonwealth, reprinted the article. Recently words from a higher authority in the architectural world, and one who has no connection with the west, or its people, have been said as much in favor of the architect as the former article was opposed to it.

Late this fall, William J. Brinkman of Chicago, an architect who received much of his training under the great Burnham, whose plans for city beautification have made many localities famous, was a visitor in Salt Lake. He was encountered by a "News" reporter who happened to find him looking over the temple grounds, and inspecting the building from the distances of the surrounding pathways.

"The first thing that impresses me about your architecture on this block is that it is genuine," he declared. "The temple is higher than any other building I have seen, and when I say that I say a great deal, for I might make comparisons with very ambitious buildings under the eye of the temple, and are bitches in stone and brick."

"The temple is far from a failure," he said when told of the Winkler criticism. "For instance this lower 'water table' as we call the design at the base, it is higher than my head, and on many buildings you will find it only a foot or two off the ground level. To build it high here was the sensible and correct thing, and is an architectural success."

"Now take the tall columns that go in regular intervals, and they are simply done, it is true, but honestly done. They are neither suggestive of gingerbread, as are so many of their kind, or of false decoration. They suggest the everlasting character of the construction, and the towers, shooting up so emphatically and solidly from the base with their tapering tops placed boldly and unquestionably in position suggest the same thing. If the builders wanted their work to state as if proclaiming aloud in words that it was built to stand forever, they could not have surpassed their design. The tapering tops are gracefully built and in good proportion. When I think of de-orations that could have been attempted in east iron, just then having a run of great popularity. I am specially impressed with what temptations have been avoided and how faithfully and sincerely the work has been executed."

DESIGN'S PURPOSES.

Turning to buildings in general, Mr. Brinkman declared that no architect has a right to judge whether a building is successful or not until he fully comprehends the purpose for which it is designed.

"Festal buildings should declare their festal purpose," he said. "Business blocks, also should express themselves according to their purposes, and so also it is with places of worship. Being ignorant of the ritual service conducted within, and with the needful arrangement of rooms, I have no right to speak of the window arrangement, or the success of the building, except its exterior. However, from what I know of the Winkler criticism, it is flippantly done, and with a consciousness for saying something ill of a thing constructed by people whom he thought it unpopular to admire."

Here Mr. Brinkman left the discussion long enough to speak of his admiration for the Salt Lake temple, built long ago, and yet more serviceable after this test of years, than any building in America erected for theatrical purposes so many years ago for the tabernacle with its wonderful arrangement of entrances and exits, and for the main portions of the assembly hall, all of which he declared showed a masterful conception of practical problems."

TEMPTATIONS ESCAPED.

"Not every architect," he said, "can do justice to his plans. Here complete justice has been done. I can make my meaning most plain to myself by thinking of a thousand things that the architect must have attempted, but which are not attempted in the temple. In every move simpli-ty and honesty of purpose are apparent. Every moulding is in proportion. Good style is shown. The buttresses and towers are well placed and architecturally correct. Altogether, the building is so far better than many of the ambitious buildings of the east, done at the same period. I can count the Church buildings on my fingers that I would call so well done."

INDIGENOUS ARCHITECTURE.

Mr. Brinkman, before returning to his work in Chicago, looked over the city's buildings in general, and he declared that the state should be especially proud of the state fair structure since it so fully carried out its festal ideal, and had in addition a personal, individual touch which is the rarest thing in American architecture, and which forestalled the play of really indigenous styles, instead of successful copies of European models, a single city street finding a splendid Elizabethan example, developed for countries with much snow, and evasive tendencies in art, right alongside of a classical example, whose art was developed for an entirely different class of civilization and to express an entirely different art feeling.

QUEEN ANNE FADS.

"At the time of the temple's building," Mr. Brinkman said in conclusion, "our eastern architects were giving us Queen Anne fads, and instead of criticizing the temple for departing from the prevailing vogue, I think they should feel joyful that out here in the west there was an architect who thought out his own models instead of using those provided by the fashion of the times. Not one of the Queen Anne structures of that period is classed as a success today. Most of them have been torn down."

Mr. Brinkman's special work at present is in churches and school houses, of which he has designed more than a hundred for prominent eastern cities. He is now at work erecting a great Catholic cathedral in Chicago, and his visit to Salt Lake was to get a few weeks of rest while the basement of this building went in, in order to prepare himself for an arduous winter, overseeing the superstructure.

HAD A ROUGH VOYAGE.

Queensdown, Dec. 13.—The oil tank steamer Baku Standard, from Rouen for Philadelphia put into this port today bearing evidence of the terrific weather which has prevailed on the Atlantic. The steamer is considerably damaged, and several of her boats were carried away. Captain and Third Officer, Ross each had a leg broken, and four seamen were seriously hurt. The Baku Standard was laboring so much in the heavy seas on Dec. 7, that the captain and third officer, with several seamen, tried to set a jib to steady her. They were in the midst of this operation when a huge sea broke over the bows and swept them all the length of the deck. Several men were almost carried overboard.

WOMAN COMMITS SUICIDE.

She died instantly. Ill health was the cause. Her husband is absent and his whereabouts is unknown to friends of the dead woman. Mrs. Jones came here about two months ago.
